Yesterday the New York Tribune takes the matter up, and I think puts a forced construction upon the clause in the Sun, and puts me in the absurd and brutal attitude of declaring that the Vice-President would be killed here in his seat if he dared to rule a given way upon a given question. I simply desire to say that no conclusion could be more absurd and untrue than any such construction put upon any language ever used by me to reporters or to other people.

The contests here are contests of reason, not of the prize ring, not of brutal force; they are contests of intellect and of reason, and have no other character.

I simply desire to disclaim uttering the brutality attributed to me by the New York Tribune article of yesterday.

I am happy to be able to say that the relations, both personal and official, between the Vice-President and myself have been of the kindest character from the beginning of our acquaintance down to this moment. That much I deemed it due to myself to say, and it was for that purpose, and for that purpose alone, that I have asked the Senate to indulge me a moment.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, October 21, 1893.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Rev. ISAAO 7. CANTER, of Washington, D. C.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MINING CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 3545) to amend section 2334 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to mining claims, with Senate amendments and request for a conference thereon. Mr. WEADOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Senate amendments be read.

The Senate amendments were read at length. Mr. WEADOCK. I move that the House nonconcur in the Senate amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate. The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced as conferees on the part of the House Mr. WEADOCK, Mr. COCKRELL, and Mr. NEWLANDS.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. REILLY, on account of sickness in his family.

REQUEST FOR LEAVE TO PRINT.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT] desires unanimous consent to print in the RECORD some remarks on the bill (H. R. 384) to enlarge the volume of currency and the distribution of the same.

Mr. DINGLEY. That is a bill that has not yet been reported by the committee and is not before the House. It seems to be a rather unusual request, since it has not been reported for consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that objection is made to the request.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The committees will be called for reports. The committees were called, there being no reports submitted. WILLIAM M'GARRAHAN.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at 11 minutes past 12 o'clock, and the call rests with the Committee on Private Land Claims, which had a bill pending at the expiration of the last morning hour, the title of which the Clerk will now report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 415) to submit to the Court of Private Land Claims, established by an act of Congress approved March 3, 1891, the title of William McGarra-han to the Rancho Panoche Grande, in the State of California, and for other

The Chair had appointed as tellers the gentle-man from West Virginia [Mr. PENDLETON] and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. BOEN]. The tellers will resume their

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be permitted to go over until Monday, with the same privileges as to-day.

Mr. DINGLEY. I must object to that.

The SPEAKER. The tellers will take their places.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Mr. Speaker, it is evident that there is no quorum here, and, if in order, I move that the House do now adjourn. the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The House is now dividing, and the motion would not be in order at this time.

Mr. DINGLEY. We will have a quorum after an hour.

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the bill for the present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can withdraw the bill.

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. Then I withdraw it.

PRINTING, COMMITTEE ON COINAGE, WEIGHTS, AND MEASURES. Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave of the House that the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures may be permitted to print such matters as are necessary for the proper consideration of subjects before that committee.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection that order will be made.

There was no objection.

DIVISION OF EASTERN DISTRICT OF MICHIGAN.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will resume the call of committees under the second morning hour.

The Committee on the Judiciary was called.
Mr. CULBERSON. I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 3713) to provide for the division of the eastern district of Mich-

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

Be it enacted, etc., That the eastern district of Michigan be, and the same is hereby, divided into two divisions, to be known as the northern division and the southern division, respectively, and that the following-named countes shall be and constitute the northern division: Checoygan, Presque Isle, Otsego, Montmorency, Alpena, Crawford, Oscoda, Alcona, Roscommon, Oge, maw, Iosco, Clare, Gladwin, Arenac, Isabella, Midland Bay, Tuscola, Huron-Gratiot, Saginaw, Shlawassee, and Genesse; and the following-named counties shall constitute the southern division: St. Clair, Lapeer, Sanilac, Macomb, Oakiand, Livingston, Ingham, Clinton, Jackson, Washtenaw, Wayne, Branch, Hillsdale, Lenawee, Calhoun, and Monroe.

SEC. 3. That there shall be at least two regular annual sessions of the circuit and district courts begun and held at Bay City in said northern division, commencing on the first Tuesdays of May and October in each year; and all issues of fact shall be tried at the terms of said courts to be held in the division where such suit shall be hereafter commenced. There shall also be held a special or adjourned term of the district court at said Bay City for the hearing of admiralty causes, beginning in the month of February in each year. The time and terms of court at Detroit and Port Huron in the southern division of said district shall remain as now fixed by law.

SEC. 3. That all suits and proceedings hereafter to be tried in said circuit and district courts, not of a local nature, shall be brought in the court of the division of the district when the charman and part in another of the district, the plaintiff may sue in either division, and part in another of the district, the plaintiff may sue in either division, and part in another of the district, the plaintiff may sue in either division, and part in another of the district, the plaintiff may sue in either division, and part in another of the district, the plaintiff may sue in either division and p

SEC 4. That the clerks of the circuit and district courts for the eastern district of Michigan shall each keep his office at the ctpy of Detroit and shall each appoint a deputy clerk for said courts held at Hay City, who shall reside and keep his office at that place, and such deputy clerk or clerks shall keep in his office dockets and full records of all actions and proceedings in said circuit and district courts for the northern division of said circuit held at that place, and shall have the same power to issue all processes from said courts and perform any other duty that is or may be given to the clerks of other circuit and district courts in like cases.

SEC 5. That the district judge for the eastern district of Michigan, who, in pursuance of the provisions of this act, shall attend the sessions thereof at any place other than where he resides, shall, upon his written certificate be paid by the marshal of said district his reasonable expenses for travel and attendance, not to exceed $\frac{4}{5}$ per day, and such payments shall be allowed the marshal in the settlement of his account with the United States. Sec. 6. That the district attorney and marshal of said eastern district of Michigan shall respectively perform the respective duties of district attorney and marshal for the southern and northern divisions of said district accounty marshal at Bay City in the northern division of said district, and mileage on service of process in said northern division of said district, and mileage on service of process in said northern division shall be computed from Bay City.

SEC. 7. That any person charged with violating any of the penal or criminal statutes of the United States in which said circuit or district courts have jurisdiction shall be proceeded against by indictment or otherwise within the division of said district where the alleged offense or offenses shall be committed, and shall have his or her trial at a term of said court heid in said division, unless, for cause shown, the judge shall otherwise direct; and one grand and one petit jury only shall be summoned, and serve in both said courts at each term thereof; jurors shall be selected and drawn from the division of said district in which they reside and in which the terms of said circuit and district curts to which they are summoned are held.

Sec. 8. That this act shall not affect or in any wise interfere with causes of action now pending in the circuit or district courts for the eastern district of Hichigan, but the same may be proceeded with in the same manner as though this act had not been passed.

The committee recommend that said bill be amended by striking out all peased.

The committee recommend that said bill be amended by striking out all of section 5, and that the word "circuit" in line 8 of page 3 of said bill be stricken out and the word "district" be inserted in lieu thereof: and with these amendments the committee report the bill back and recommend that the same do pass.

Mr. CULBERSON. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois

[Mr. LANE]. Mr. LANE. Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, I presume there can be no objection to this bill, and unless some gentleman desires to ask a question in reference to it, I ask a vote. I will state that it in-curs no expense. In fact, it curtails the cost to the Government. It provides for the holding of the court at two places instead of one. There are public buildings there and everything ready for the court.

Mr. SAYERS. Without additional expense to the Government?

Mr. LANE. It will not cost a cent, as I have already stated. The bill was considered, the amendments recommended by the committee agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LANE, a motion to reconsider the last vota was laid on the table.

STEAM REVENUE CUTTER, NEW ENGLAND COAST.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. Speaker, I call up from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce the bill (H. R. 3421) pro-viding for the construction of a steam revenue cutter for the New England coast.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be if enacted, etc. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized to have constructed a steam revenue cutter of the first class for service on the New England coast; and for said purpose the sum of $175.000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. MALLORY. I have an amendment striking out the appropriation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will send up the amend-or of the Asplan to the House whether or not he has any communication from the Secretary of the Treasury—

Mr. McMILLIN. This is a bill which will have to be considered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MALLORY. The report contains the views of the Secretary of the Treasury. He states that such a revenue cutter is absolutely necessary to take the place of the Gallatin, which was wrecked in 1892.

Mr. McMILLIN. A pertinent inquiry, Mr. Speaker, would be as to whether there is any money in the Treasury to build one with.

Mr. REED. Oh, we are going to issue some bonds.
The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole.
Mr. MALLORY. I ask that the amendment be read. It

The SPEAKER. The bill would still create a charge upon the Treasury. The gentleman might ask unanimous consent to consider the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MALLORY. I ask unanimous consent to consider the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, let it go to Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] objects.

Mr. MALLORY. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the bill. The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill, Mr. DOCKERY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committe to consider the bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the bill.

Mr. MALLORY. I will read the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury in response to a request from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. He says:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, September 27, 1893.

SIR: I have respectfully to acknowledge the receipt of a communication, dated the 23d instant, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, transmitting for the views of this Department H. R. bill 343t, providing for the construction of a steam revenue cutter of the first class for service on the New England coast, and appropriating therefor the sum of $175,000 in reply, I have the honor to state that the vessel provided for in the bill inceded for service on the coast of New England between Portsmouth, N. H., and Gay Heed, Mass., including Massachusetts Bay and Nantucket Shoats, and to take the place of the revenue steamer Galiatin, weeked January 6, 1852, on a sunken ledge of Manchester, Mass., during a blinding anowstorm. In my opinion the sum named will construct a vessel of the class required for this duty, and Fearmestly recommend that the bill receive favorable consideration. The paper is returned.

Respectfully yours,

C. S. HAMLIN, Acting Secret

Hon. GEORGE D. WISE, M. C., Chairman Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, House of Representatives.

It has been suggested to me that I offer an amendment striking out the appropriation and limiting the expense to be in-curred to the amount named in the bill. I ask that the amoundment be placed before the committee, to be acted upon.
The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, general debate will be considered as closed, and the gentleman can offer his amend-

There was no objection.
The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "coast" in line 5 of the bill, and insert in lieu thereof the words "at a cost of not exceeding $175,000."

Mr. McMillin. Is there any report accompanying the bill?
Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. Mallory] has read the letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, which is embodied in the report.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to needlessly take up the time of the committee, nor to speak so particularly of this bill as of the general policy that I think it is time to enter upon in the beginning of this session.

We have a rather difficult and altogether embarrassing situation confronting us. By reason of extravagant legislation here-tofore passed, raising the expenditures of the Government to about $500,000,000 per annum, and then imposing an excessive rate of duty, preventing imports and cutting off revenues, we have to-day a constantly increasing difficulty in the fact that there is less money being collected than is being expended, if I understand the situation.

I do not remember that there has been anything paid on the sinking fund for a considerable time. Nothing could be paid for lack of money. This is an open secret. If we further increase appropriations we may have to pay a part of the current expenses of the Government out of the $100,000,000 gold reserve that has been knot in the Taylorus for remembers. been kept in the Treasury for years as a fund to redeem the out-standing paper obligations of the United States. Therefore, when we make new appropriations here, it might as well be un-derstood that these appropriations are to come out of the gold reserve that has been held as a fund to redeem the paper obligations of the Government.

Mr. CULBERSON. By what authority can that be done?

Mr. McMILLIN. I am not talking about the authority. If it is met we have nowhere else for it to come from. I am not talking about whether it can be done; but, as I understand, we have had to pay current expenditures from that fund. believer in the doctrine that this may be done under the law.

Now, I am not discussing in that the propriety of doing it. That is another thing; but as a legal question it seems to me it may be done. I know it has been reported that we paid the ourrent expenses of this Government out of the gold fund. I know at the same time there was a great deal of discussion whether more or less silver should be coined; there was a good deal of high kicking all over this city because they had to take gold. I submit we had as well face the fact that the expenditures are in excess of the receipts.

This condition is not new to-day, was not new last week, or last month; and it is not likely to cease to-morrow, next week, or next month. Why, the deficiency in the Post-Office Department alone for the year will be over $12,000,000.

This may be a very proper measure. I know the painstaking way in which the gentleman in charge of the bill does the work intrusted to him by the House. I am not antagonizing this bill. But in all of our legislation here this state of facts confronts us. and we may as well prepare to meet it in all our legislation, and make the appropriations as slight as possible.

Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman from Tennessee permit me a question. Is he aware that this bill provides for the construction of a boat to take the place of one lost in a blinding snowstorm on the Atlantic coast in January, 1892?

Mr. McMILLIN. That fact had escaped me, and is pertinent

Sir, let us make no needless expenditure. Let us retrench expenditures, revise the tarif, and watch not only that too much money is not collected, but also that that which is collected shall be judiciously appropriated.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to supplement what has been said by the gentleman from Tennessee with the statement that this Congress will be called upon to make a much larger appropriation for deficiencies for the postal service than for many years past. I am informed that the postal receipts are falling off very rapidly.

Mr. BRETZ. Why?

Mr. SAYERS. Because of the stagnation in business. In my judgment, instead of Congress being required to make an appro-priation of from $5,000,000 to $7,000,000 deficiencies for the postal service, it will exceed $15,000,000, unless there should be a very great change for the better in the matter of receipts during the next eight months.

I have no objection to this bill, but only avail myself of the opportunity to call the attention of members of the House to this

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, as to this bill, providing authority for the construction of a revenue vessel for the first revenue district, I will state that it will take the place of the one which has been wrecked. Of course, it is essential that this vessel should be constructed in order to protect the collection of the revenue. It is therefore in the line of one of the necessary things for us to do regardless of other conditions, or else there will not be so much revenue collected as there would otherwise be. So much for that.

A single word further in reference to the suggestion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMillin] who has just addressed the committee as to the cause of the condition of things which we find to-day, in which the revenue is less than the ex-

The gentleman omitted to state the one actual cause of this The gentleman omitted to state the one actual cause of this condition of our financial affairs, while naming several alleged reasons which have nothing to do with the situation. The revenues of last year and the year before, under the existing tariff, were sufficient to meet all the expenses under the legislation to which the gentleman has referred. The revenue for the current fiscal year has fallen off in consequence of the fin incial and industrial condition of the country in the past six months. Our revenue has declined in three months to the extent of about $21,000,000, as compared with the same months of last year, and in consequence of this falling off we have failed to meet our expenditures by the sum of $19,000,000; and the estimate of the Sec etary of the Treasury is that the deficit on the 1st day of July next will be not less th in $50,000,000.

This is not owing to any material increase of expenditures, but to the loss of revenue; and therefore it is true, as has been sug-gested by the gentleman from Tennessee, that we are providing to day for an excess of expenditures above the revenue by taking money from the gold redemption fund, pledged for the redemption of the notes which have been issued by the Government, and are using it as current funds to meet expenditures.

Now, my judgment is, without reference to whether there is authority for doing this, that this course is unwise in the highest degree. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], in a report presented in the last Congress, took the ground, and I agree with him, that there is no authority of law to use that money called the gold redemption fund, especially the ninety-five and a half millions purchased for the specific purpose of redemption by the sale of bonds, for anything but the redemption of United States legal-tender notes; but there being no specific provision of law absolutely setting apart this as a trust fund, except the inferential provision in the act of 1882, it has been done, done from a seeming necessity, perhaps, on the idea that it was the only means we had to meet a deficit.

Yet we are as truly contracting a debt which must be paid by

Yet we are as truly contracting a debt which must be paid by making good so much of the redemption fund as we use to pay current obligations; that it would be much wiser to borrow the amount of the deficit at once rather than make use of a fund amount of the deneit at once rather than make use of a rund established for another purpose, a fund which must be maintained if we would not invite greater evils.

Now, we ought not, I agree with my friend from Tennessee, to be using this gold redemption fund, as we are to-day, to meet the current expenditures of the Government. There is no doubt about that. It is likely to cause serious trouble for us financially if this shall go on. The gold redemption fund has already been reduced to $82,000,000, and it is inevitable, if this depletion goes on, it will cause a want of confidence, not only here, but expeon, it will cause a want of confidence, not only here, but especially abroad, that will again provoke a return of the difficulties which we have already had.

Of course there is but one way to meet the difficulty. That is the way that was suggested by the action of the Senate at the last session of Congress—an issue of bonds—and if the last House had concurred with the Senate at that time in reaffirming the authority to issue bonds given by the act of 1875, I have no doubt that the mere expression of the will of the Nation that we intended to maintain that redemption fund would have preserved our credit, and we should not have seen the financial revulsion although we should have seen the industrial depression that we have already had. It was a mistake not to arm the Secretary and Treasurer with authority which he recognized and which the world recognized as an authority which would be used, and if we had reaffirmed that authority last February, I do not believe that there would have been a necessity for selling a single bond; but we refused to reaffirm authority and the Secretary subsequently declined to act under the authority of the act of 1875, and thus notice was given to the world that we also not in 1875, and thus notice was given to the world that we did not intend to replenish that redemption fund.

The result was what we have seen; and if we go on depleting this gold redemption fund much longer we shall see trouble again, arising from precisely the same cause. I think that we should not continue to deplete this fund.

I concur with the gentleman from Tennessee that wherever we can, wherever the expenditure is not necessary for carrying on the Government, maintaining its revenue and enforcing its laws, and otherwise carrying on the Government, we should limit expenditure. There is no doubt but that is the duty which is upon us at this time; but there are some expenditures absorbed. is upon us at this time; but there are some expenditures absolutely necessary to the maintenance of the Government, and the preservation of the revenue by providing revenue vessels is one of them, and this bill, therefore, seems to come within the lines of necessary objects of government.

Mr. MALLORY was recognized.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. I wish to ask the gentleman from Maine a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] has the floor.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. Chairman, if this bill proposed to add anything to the Revenue Marine Service, if it was a new departure providing for a vessel that had never existed, I can underare providing for a vessel that had never existed, I can understand why objection might be urged against it. But the bill simply proposes to replace a vessel which has been destroyed, to replace it by a suitable vessel for the important service rendered by the one that was wrecked. I do not think it will be disputed that it is absolutely necessary for the administration of our revenue service along our coast that there should be a revenue cutter equipped for the revenue service heretofore rendered by the

Mr. FITHIAN. What is the proposed cost of this vessel?
Mr. MALLORY. Not exceeding $175,000. That is a large sum of money I admit, but you can not build a sea-going vessel to cruise along that coast, which in many months of the year is very tempestuous, for a less sum.

The Secretary of the Treasury, who, I take it for granted, is as well informed as to the financial condition of the country as any one else, heartily indorses this measure and earnestly the language of his letter-recommends the passage of the bill

I do not propose, Mr. Chairman, to go into a discussion of the nancial condition of the country. Whatever differences may I do not propose, Mr. Chairman, to go into a discussion of the financial condition of the country. Whatever differences may exist among us as to the best financial policy to be pursued I am satisfied that we all agree that this machinery shall be kept oiled, shall go on, and be permitted to work for the benefit of the Government; and this is one of the instrumentalities of that machinery which the Secretary of the Treasury says is absolutely necessary, and which I think every member on this floor will admit is necessary if the Revenue Marine is a necessary adjunct of our service. junct of our service.

Mr. BRICKNER. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMillin], and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Sayers], that we should be very careful about appropriating money for any purpose. We are all aware that the Treasury is substantially empty. But we can not overlook the great necessity that exists for protecting commerce and life and property. When you cripple commerce you cripple the income of the Government. Now, there are three of these cutters that are absolutely necessary. Being on the committee, and having examined the matter quite closely, I find that these cutters have saved more lives than have been saved by any other equal expenditure on the partof the Government. We have one on the great lakes which is now worn out, having been built in 1856. All the above-mentioned steamers answer a double purpose, for preventing smuggling and assisting vessels in distress.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Do I understand the gentleman to say that this is a life-saving boat, or is it a revenue boat?

that this is a life-saving boat, or is it a revenue boat?

Mr. BRICKNER. They are always used for the purpose of saving life and property wherever commerce or those engaged in it are in danger. The purpose of these vessels is to enforce the revenue laws, but also to assist vessels that are stranded where life or property is in danger, and they have always done that. Looking over the list I find that the Andy Johnson has that. Looking over the list I find that the persons. It is true saved the lives of four hundred and fifty-six persons. It is true saved the lives of four hundred and fifty-six persons. The vessel which this bill proposes to replace has an equally good record in proportion to the time that she was in the service.

Now, I have no objection if you stop work on some of the cruisers on which we are wasting money by the millions—for I can not see what good they are—but it is not possible that we can wisely curtail expenditure on these vessels which are an absolute necessity to enforce our revenue laws, and to save life and property when they are in danger.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Florida, which the Clerk will report:

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "cost" in line 5, and insert in lieu thereof, "at a cost not exceeding $175,000."

Mr. LIVINGSTON. As I understand, this amendment strikes out the appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. It does.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. It seems to me if that is to be done we might as well strike out the whole bill. As a member of the Committee on Appropriations I should feel, if this bill passes, that it would be appropriation of the committee on appropriation of the committee on appropriations.

Committee on Appropriations I should feel, if this bill passes, that it would be the duty of our committee to report an adequate appropriation to carry it out. Why not let the appropriation stay in the bill and be done with the matter at once?

Mr. SAYERS. The reason is this, Mr. Chairman: that instead of appropriating $175,000 for one year we shall appropriate but a portion of that sum at the present session of this Congress.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Well, one question in my mind is whether this vessel ought to be built at all.

Mr. SAYERS. That is another question.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I would like to know what part of the coast this vessel is intended for. Is it coming down our way?

Mr. MALLORY. No; it will not come down the gentleman's way. It is intended for the New England coast—the coast of Maine and Massachusetts.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Well, they have plenty of people up there to look after the interests of those who may be in danger of shipwreck, while the southern coast is very sparsely settled. It there to look after the interests of those who may be in danger of shipwreck, while the southern coast is very sparsely settled. It seems to me it is partiality to appropriate $175,000 to take care of people who may be in danger of drowning on the eastern coast, unless we do something for that part of the coast where there is equal danger and more need of this kind of service.

Mr. MALLORY. The gentleman is under a misapprehension. This vessel is not for the life-saving service, but for the revenue service. It is to supply the place of a revenue cutter which was lost a year ago.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that instead of a revenue cutter we get some United States marshals to operate upon the land in collecting the revenue; that would be a great deal cheaper. That is the way we do in Georgia. revenue cutter down there. We have no

Mr. MALLORY. Oh, yes; the gentleman has a revenue cutter on the coast of Geergia.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. MALLORY,

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DOCKERY reported that the Committee of sumed the chair, Mr. Dockery reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 3421) providing for the construction of a steam revenue cutter for the New England coast, had directed him to report the same back with an amendment, and with the recommendation that the bill be passed as amended.

The SPEAKER. The first question is on agreeing to the amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. SAYERS. Let it go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MALLORY. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. DOCKERY in the chair) and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3287) providing for the construction of a steam revenue cutter for service on the Great Lakes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Reti enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized to have constructed a steam revenue cutter of the first class for service on the Great Lakes; and for said purpose the sum of $175,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce was read, as follows:

Amend by striking out all after the word "Lakes," in line 5, down to the had of the bill, and inserting in lieu thereof the words: "Provided, That the stof said construction shall not exceed the sum of $175,000."

Mr. MALLORY. I ask that a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury in reference to this bill be read. The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, September 27, 1893.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, September 17, 1893.

SIR: I have respectfully to acknowledge the receipt of a communication, dated 22d instant, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, transmitting, for the views of this Department, H. R. bill 3297, providing for the construction of a steam revenue cutter of the first class for service on the Great Lakes, and appropriating therefor the sum of $175,000.

In reply, I have the honor to state that the vessel provided for in the bill is required to take the place of the revenue steamer Johnson, stationed at Milwaukee, Wis., with cruising grounds covering lakes Michigan and Surveyor.

Milwankee, wis., with cruising grounds covering takes michigan and superior.

The Johnson is an old side-wheel vessel, built nearly thirty years ago, and requires frequent and expensive repairs. Her hull is nearly worn out and her machinery is of obsolete type. A new vessel of modern construction is needed to take her place.

I consider the amount named in the bill sufficient to construct the class of vessel required, and I carnestly recommend the passage of House bill 3297, which is herewith returned.

Respectfully, yours,

C. S. HAMLIN, Acting Secretary.

Hon. George D. Wise, 'M. C.,

Chairman Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce,

House of Representatives,

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I would be glad if the gentleman in charge of this bill would inform the committee whether there is an absolute and immediate necessity for the construction of this cutter. We would be glad to know how many of these vessels there are now in active service; and whether the vessel of which this new cutter is intended to take the place on the lakes could not be used for three or four years longer without danger. It does seem to me that in providing for the construction of one new revenue cutter Congress is going just as far as it ought to go at the present time. I have no objection to putting the Revenue Cutter Service into good condition; but I believe that in view of the certain deficiency in the Treasury it is the duty of Congress not to make provision during the present ses-

Mr. Chairman, if this bill be passed, although it carries no appropriation, and it should become a law, then when the sundry civil appropriation bill is before the House for consideration it will be in order to offer an amendment to appropriate the money necessary for the construction of this vessel. If the Democrats of this House desire to make this an extravagant Congress, let them understand that a vote for this bill will be on the line of extravagance, and such measures will contribute to swell the

Now, I wish every member to understand that when he votes for a measure of this character, on his own shoulders must rest the responsibility for the large regular appropriation bills. If the gentleman from Florida will withdraw the bill and present it at the next session I will have no objection, so that we may build one vessel a year for the Revenue Cutter Service.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. Chairman, I am not personally specially interested in the passage of this bill, but as a member of this House and a member of the committee reporting the bill, I feel that it is one which ought to be passed. I heartily joined with the recommendation of the committee to that end. The vessel now depended upon to carry on the business of guarding the now depended upon to carry on the business of guarding the coast of Wisconsin, Michigan, and our lake borders up along the coasts of Minnesota and Lake Superior, has been reported on time and again as being inadequate for the service and a dangerous vessel, to the extent that it exposes the lives of those on board of her to constant risk. She is an old vessel; she is out of date; her machinery is obsolete and is practically condemned, although she is still in the service. The Department has called attention to the fact and state that-the vessel provided for in the bill is required to take the place of the revenue steamer Johnson, stationed at Milwaukee, Wis., with cruising grounds covering Lakes Michigan and Superior.

The Johnson is an old side-wheel vessel, built nearly thirty years ago, and require frequent and expensive repairs. Her hull is nearly worn out, and her machinery is of obsolete type. A new vessel of modern construction is needed to take her place.

Mr. SAYERS. Can the gentleman inform the House how many vessels are now being used in the Revenue Cutter Service?
Mr. MALLORY. No, sir; I have not the information.
Mr. SAYERS. Then I submit that until the House can get such information it will be hardly wise to make provision for building another vessel.

Mr. MALLORY. Do you mean the entire number of vessels mployed in the revenue service?

Mr. SAYERS. Yes; the whole number of vessels in the service. We have already a vessel engaged in the service which is performing duty; and with all due deference to the gentleman, I do not think from the language of the report just read that it is in as bad a condition as he seems to believe. If there is a number of these vessels engaged in different parts of the country, and it is necessary to replace the vessel at this point, why not take a vessel from some other service, on some other part of the coast, and send it there, at least temporarily?

Mr. MALLORY. The reason, I presume, is because they are just as much needed in the places where they are located as they are at this point.

Mr. MALLORY. That is a presumption. Can not the gentle-

This bill, I will state, has been before the committee on previous occasions. This vessel is asked for, and a bill providing for the building of another vessel to take her place was before the Committee on Interstate Commerce in the last Congress, received its approval, and, if I remember correctly, it passed this House. At that time, over a year ago, it was then urged as a reason for action in the matter that this old vessel on the lake was absolutely unfit for the service, that it was unseaworthy, was dangerous, and I should not be at all surprised if we continue to require this vessel to perform the service in the stormy season on the lakes, that we will some day receive the intelligence that she has gone down with all on board.

It was stated before the committee, during our inquiry into it, that she is absolutely unfit for the service, and the facts are demonstrated that she was built thirty years ago, that she is so old that constant and expensive repairs are required all the time, that her machinery is of an obsolete type, and it seemed to the committee that in consideration of all of these facts they were justified in providing for the construction of a new v

Now, as to sending a vessel from another district to take her place, as the gentleman from Texas suggests, it will not be possible, I take it, to do that. There is a vessel, I think, on Lake Erie, and I think that that is the only one in this region of country. But there are members here who are familiar with the facts and can state positively whether that is the condition

But this bill simply proposes to replace an obsolete type of vessel, a vessel dangerous to life, not sultable for the purposes, by a new vessel which when completed will be good for at least thirty years, and require no further expenditure.

I will state further to the committee and to the gentleman from Texas, particularly, that these two bills are the only two bills of that character that the committee has had before it or will probably have before it.

will probably have before it.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say just this to the gentleman from Florida, and to the members of this committee. It is well known that there will have to be an increased appropriation for the support of the light-house establishment. Of course the Committee on Interstate Commerce, I take it, will report a bill providing for the construction of new light-houses. Now, it does seem to me that this is the time, and it is the part of wisdom while we intend to improve the revenue and cutter service and the light-house service, that we ought to do so very earsefully keening ourselves within rigid lines and causeful lines. carefully, keeping ourselves within rigid lines and careful limits of the revenues we now have. If no appropriation is to be made during the present Congress for the construction of this ship I shall have no objection to the passage of the bill, for I would put the Revenue Cutter Service of the country on the best possible basis. The objection I have to the passage of the bill now is the deficiency of the revenues, and the immense size of the appropriations if hills of this character reas without chication the control of the service of the country of the service priations, if bills of this character pass without objection.

Mr. BRICKNER. I will try to answer some of the gentle-There are two revenue cutters on the Great man's questions. which have to perform the service on the entire chain of lakes, including several thousand miles of coast. One of these revenue cutters is the Fessenden and the other the Johnson. The Johnson was built in 1856. The report states her character. She was rebuilt some twenty years ago, and to-day she is in a worse condition than at that time.

This boat was considered last year by the committee. The committee were not satisfied whether the vessel was really in the condition stated in the report received from the Secretary of the Treasury. We called the captain of the service before the committee, and he made the statement that the vessel certainly was not sufe, that she was wholly unserworthy at that time, two years ago. Very slight repairs have been made on her, and cer-years ago. Very slight repairs have been made on her, and cortainly she has grown no better.

If we should neglect to replace this vessel with something more secure and more suited for the purpose, in my opinion it would be a matter of sheer neglect. We know how well guarded our Canadian borders should be to prevent smuggling. At present any craft that has any speed at all, can run away from this vessel. It is of no value for that purpose. A little while ago there was a severe storm on Lake Michigan. There were fifteen men at work on the in-take crib two miles out from Milwaukee, and the crib and the lives of the men were in danger, but the and the criband the lives of the men were in danger, but the unseaworthiness of the Johnson prevented the captain from started to go there, but got there too late, and fourteen of the fifteen men had drowned. Had the Johnson been a seaworthy boat, she could have saved every one of them.

Mr. SAYERS. Is not the re son for desiring the construction of a new vessel rather in order to get one of a modern type than of a new vessel rather in order to get one of a modern type than to replace one that is dangerous?

Mr. BRICKNER. No; I know the vessel well. I have been on board of her and I have been on steamers a great many times in the last thirty years. I have never been on one about which I had such grave fears as about this one, two years ago.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I would like to make a suggestion to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. As was stated a few moments ago, it is not necessary that the whole sum to build one of these revenue cutters should be appropriated at one Here are but two of these vessels proposed to be constructed; and instead of appropriating the whole amount, a wessel, which is in the employment of the Government, a versel on which the lives of the officers and orew are continued by an appropriate of $100,000.

Now, when you come to reflect upon it, it is stated that this is a dangerous vessel, which is in the employment of the Government, a versel on which the lives of the officers and orew are continued by independent of the continued by i continually in danger. If during the time that we are hesitating about building a vessel to replace this tub, as it has been called, it should go to the bottom, there is not one of us who would not feel but it would have been better to appropriate the whole amount than that the lives upon the vessel should have been lost. I think it might be well not to object to this. As the gentleman in charge of the bill [Mr. MALLORY] says, there are only two of them

Mr. MALLORY. There may be a misapprehension. is another bill also, providing for a boarding boat for San Francisco Harbor. That is not a large vessel, however.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Is that a revenue cutter?

Mr. MALLORY. A small boat, a boarding vessel, not a revenue cutter for sea service.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. There seems to be a necessity for the vessel which is now asked for.
Mr. KYLE. I want to ask the gentleman from Florida a ques-

Mr. MALLORY.

Mr. KYLE. Has there been any investigation as to the necessity for replacing this vessel since the last session of Congress?
Mr. MALLORY. No, I think not. The information furnished us at the last session of Congress was such as to convince the committee-

Mr. KYLE. Then this boat has done two years' service since she was investigated before?

Mr. MALLORY. About a year's service, yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The hour having expired, the committee

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having re sumed the chair, Mr. DOCKERY, chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 3297) providing for the construction of a steam revenue cutter for service on the Great Lakes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed joint resolutions of the following titles:

On October 21, 1893:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 14) authorizing the State of Wisconsin to place in Statuary Hall at the Capitol the statue of Pere Marquette; and

On October 17, 1893:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 65) fixing the qualifications to vote and to hold office in the Cherokee Outlet, Oklahoma Territory, at the first municipal elections.

PUBLIC PRINTING AND BINDING.

On motion of Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 2650) to provide for the public printing and binding, and the distribution of public documents.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending amendment is that offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BELTZHOOVER].

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, on yesterday the gentlem in from Pennsylvania [Mr. BELTZHOVER] of fered an amendment providing that-

All blanks, blank books, and printed or engraved matter of every kind whatsoever supplied by the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Postmaster-General, and the Attorney-General, to any of the employes or bureaus under them, or used by them in their Departments, shall be obtained from the lowest responsible bilders for furnishing printed and engraved matter respectively, under separate advertisements calling for proposals to furnish the same.

Now, that means to destroy the Printing Office, while the amendment provides also that the Government Printing Office shall be made a competitor for this work with private concerns. It says that if the Government Printing Office will do the work more cheaply than the private concern it shall have the contract. It therefore forces the maintenance of the Government Printing Office, and does not give them the work unless they underbid the private contracto a; and if they underbid them they get the work; and if they do not get the work you still maintain the Public Printing Office.

Public Printing Office.
But this amendment not only takes the work of the Government Printing Office, it takes the work from the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. That does not come under the Public Printer, and he has nothing to do with that Bureau. The printing bill has nothing whatever to do with the work of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.
Unless we want to incur a very great expense, it seems to me we ought not to adopt this amendment. We tried it a number of years, and Congress unanimously abandoned it. As I have said before, I have the facts here. They proved that a man was smalled to give $100.001 for a managen purposes for his party out enabled to give $100,000 for campaign purposes for his party out of these contracts; and they said we must abandon that or it will swamp the Government. They went to work and changed the system; not that getting the work done at the Government Printing Office is any cheaper than by having it done by private parties, but it is done quickly and expeditiously, and done at cost, when the Government deals fairly with its employés. That is all I desire to say; and I hope the genteman will allow the debate to be closed and that we may proceed to a vote on the question

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Mr. Chairman, I shall not detain the House long in the brief reply which I shall make to the argument of the gentleman who answered me yesterday. The reasons in behilf of this amendment seem to me to appeal with overwhelming force to the considerate judgment of all intelligent men who want economy in the administration of govern-

In the reply which the gentleman from Tennessee made he dragged in a large number of collateral and absolutely irrelevant matters, which obscure the question upon which I want the committee to act intelligently. The issue is a plain, clear, and unmistakable one. The Government printing costs $,500,000 per year, and is composed of two great parts; what are properly called Congressional printing, amounting to $1,500,000 a year, and departmental printing, amounting to $1,400,000.

Now, you perceive they are entirely distinct appropriations, and devoted to entirely distinct fields of labor. I do not propose to interfere with both. The giant Hercules, when he cleaned the Augean stable, turned in two rivers, the Alpheus and Nepheus. I do not propose to correct but one of these great and Nepheus. I do not propose to correct but one of these great and complicated departments of the Government, where it is admitted by the gentleman himself, and all persons, that there dding for the construction of a steam revenue cutter for service a the Great Lakes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his reason that the gentleman says it was. To let the entire printing of this Government to private contractors leads to having no competition, and hence to collusion and corruption between bidders, as was shown in former times, when it came to be understood that he who contributed most to campaign funds would get the contracts. When private parties compete for work they combine together and prevent competition. But the Government Printing Office, having been established, is a public competitor without interest of any kind, so that it stands honestly in competition with private contractors, and competes fairly, as it will be compelled to under the amendment I propose.

This question of now to reduce the public printing is not a new one. It began away back in 1855, when the Government Printing Office was established. But in 1883, at the suggestion of the Postmaster-General and other persons interested in the question, an experiment was made. In that year an act was passed, under which the Postmaster-General was allowed to have competition the received to all printing in the postal memory order, busen by which the Postmaster-General was allowed to have competition in regard to all printing in the postal money-order bureau between the Government Printing Office and private contractors in such a way as not to interfere with the management of the Government Printing Office, but to see whether money could be saved to the Government. That experiment began in 1884 and has continued now for ten years, and is no longer an experiment. It is a demonstration. It has been tried four years under a Democratic Administration, four years under a Republican Administration and now continues under the present Administraministration, and now continues under the present Administra-tion, and has proven an emphatic and undoubted success. The Government has saved by that system in one bureau alone $305,

Why should it not be applied to the other departmental printing? Why should we not have the right to try it—because that is all my amendment proposes. The gentleman objects that it will bring about conflict and confusion between the Government Printing Office and private contractors. Notatall. The amendment provides that every four years, with the coming in of a new Administration, the heads of each Department shall call upon the Government Printer for his estimates for the work required by each, and advertise for proposals from private printers for the same work Upon the bids made by the Public Printer and by the private printers in competition the contracts are to be entered into with those which are cheapest. At the beginning of his administra-tion the Government Printer knows how much help he will retion the Government Printer knows how much help he will require, and no confusion need necessarily result at all. There is thus a binding, valid contract under the law for each of the Departments for all work that is required to be done during the four ensuing years. The Public Printer does not need to break up or disarrange the Printing Office in any way. He employs at the beginning only such help as he requires after these contracts are mide, and so on from time to time; in short, he goes on as he goes on now. This will not have any effect upon the Government Printing Office except that it will save the Government the countries of a million dollars a year in the cost of dement the ee-quarters of a million dollars a year in the cost of departmental printing.

The gentleman from Tennessee says that Mr. Wanamaker was The gentleman from Tennessee says that Mr. Wanamaker was not examined under outh. That is true. No oath was required. The gentleman's committee sent Mr. Wanamaker the questions which they asked other witnesses, and he replied to them.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. What I said was that Mr. Wanamaker was not called as a witness before the committee.

Others were called as witnesses, but he simply made a state-

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. He was called just exactly as you call any other distinguished witness.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Yes; but not as we called forty or fifty other witnesses.

Mr. BELIZHOOVER. He was called just as you wanted him. If any one had intimated that he was desired to come before the committee to be examined in any other way, he would have gone with great pleasure. If any one had intimated that what he said was not true, he would have gone there and established its truth. No man intimated that there was any doubt about the truth of his statement, or that any one desired to cross-examine him. Why, then, should it be said now that he was not called as a witness, when his testimony was taken on interrogatories, and was assented to and uncontradicted?

Why are not the statements made by him to be taken as established conclusively, and why should not this House avail itself of the information contained in those statements, in this hour when, as the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and as the Secretary of the Treasury tell us, we are threatened with a deficiency of more than $90,000,000 in the revenues next Under such circumstances, why should we not at least try to economize to the extent of three-quarters of a million dollars, Why not make the experiment, which as we can doin this way? is no longer an experiment, but a matter of demonstration from the experience of eleven years? One word more. Mr. COOPER of Indiana. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Certainly, if it does not come out of my time.

Mr. COOPER of Indiana. Just a short question. With reference to the saving which you say will result upon the adoption of your amendment. I will ask you, with a view of testing whether it is really in behalf of economy that you oppose this bill, whether you did not the other day, during the pendency of this measure, favor an amendment to put upon it an extra item for the printing of the war records, to furnish those volumes to each member of the House not already supplied with them, at a cost of $220 of the House, not already supplied with them, at a cost of $220 for each member? And was not that done with the view of trying to break down the bill?

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. I voted for those amendments because they were just and proper, and he ought to hesit ite to criticise me or any man for voting here, unselfishly, to give him and other members the books which, I understand, he voted to supply himself with in the last Congress, and which I have voted now to give to the new members of the present Congress.

Mr. COOPER of Indians. I did not vote for the item, and if a set was allowed to me I gave it away, so that I have not got it, and I do not desire to have any voted to me now.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. I did the same with mine.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania call attention to the point in this bill which, as he says, repeals the law of 1883 of which he speaks?

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. The provision that all laws inconsistent with this act are repealed.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. But my friend wants to be fair.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. I am fair. [Laughter.]
Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. This section 90, which we are now discussing, provides that "all printing, binding, and blank books for the Senate or House of Representatives and for the executive and judicial departments shall be done at the Government Printing Office, except in cases otherwise provided by law," thus making a direct exception of the case referred to

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Will the gentleman agree, then, that that provision shall say, "except as provided by the act of March

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I will, undoubtedly.
Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Then it is understood, Mr. Chairman, that I need not address myself further to that particular question.

In further reply to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COOPER] I wish to say that I did vote for the amendment to which he has referred, and I said that this cheese-paring economy invited the derision and contempt of the country, when you vote appropriations, as you do here frequently, right in the face of facts which show that they are grossly extravagant and unnecessary. I voted to give the farmers of this country the usual number of Agricultural Reports—I say the usual number because the gentleman's bill proposed to cut down the number a hundred thousand and to give a few more books on the Diseases of the Horse to the 30,000 voters of my district, and to the voters of the 355 other districts of this country, and to give each member of Congress who was not in previous Congresses certain volumes of the Rewhich I received in a prior Congress—the whole thing not aggregating a hundred thousand dollars.

When a gentleman criticises me for that criticism, and then stands up here and opposes an amendment which will save this Government three-quarters of a million of dollars, I think he does not occupy a very enviable position. If this amendment is to be rejected, I appeal to gentlemen to give us some better reason for rejecting it than any that has yet been assigned.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Now, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania will indicate the provision of law which he desires to specify so that it shall not be repealed by this act—the law of 1873 authorizing the Postmaster-General to contract for the work which has been mentioned—I will make no objec-for the work which it is been mentioned—I will make no objection to an amendment of that kind.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Oh. I will wait until this amendment is voted on. I hope we shall adopt the amendment, and that will settle the question.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I hope we shall not adopt

the amendment.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a few words on the general question of Government printing. As has been said by the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. Beltzhoover], the printing of this Government costs in the neighborhood of three and a half million dollars annually. That is a large sum, and undoubtedly, if the situation were such that this work could be done entirely by a private printing office or offices, in the same way that a private concern does its work, there could be some saving. But a large part of this work is exigency work, work which must be done immediately, whether by night or by day, and it must be done in this city. Now, as to that class of work, it has been proved by experience that it is absolutely necessary to have a Government Printing Office, notwithstanding that the work done in this way costs more than it would if we could let the work out by contract to outside parties and could wait for the work, sending it to other places, if contractors in other cities offered us advantageous terms. But we can not do this, because of the situation as to that class of work.

The reason that the work costs more when done by the Government than it would if done in private offices lies very largely in the legislation of Congress. First, we provide that one-fifth less time shall constitute a day's work in the Government Printing Office than is usual in all offices outside. Secondly, we provide by law that the price per thousand for composition shall be in the neighborhood of 10 to 20 per cent more than the prices prevailing outside. Thirdly, we provide for vacations for employes; and during those periods we continue regular pay. Those three reasons (and they are reasons not dependent at all upon the conduct of that office) necessarily involve a somewhat increased expenditure.

And I desire to say in passing that as a member of the Committee on Appropriations it became my duty in the last session of Congress to make some examination of the Government Printof Congress to make some examination of the Government? This ing Office, and, having some practical acquaintance with the business, I was enabled, I think, to draw very correct conclusions. I desire, therefore, in justice to the Government Printer and the officials connected with the Government Printing Office, to say that more efficient men can not be secured than they are. The business of the office is conducted as faithfully and as efficiently as is possible in any great establishment like that, subject to such laws as Congress has imposed for its management.

And we must maintain the establishment for exigency work. And by exigency work I mean all the work ordered by Congress, or nearly all of it, which must be done immediately. I include, too, not only the work done for Congress, but a certain portion of the Department work.

of the Department work.

Now, as to a large portion of the Department work, outside of blanks and blank books, nearly all of it is exigency work, which must be done on the spur of the moment, by night or day, as the occasion may be. And this must be done in our Government Printing Office. Now, I would have no objection at all—indeed I would like to see the experiment tried—to having that portion of the Department work which is not exigency work—namely blanks and blank books, and nothing more, to start with—done by contract.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. DINGLEY.

Mr. DINGLEY. Yes, sir.
Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Will you offer an amendment covering that class of work and providing that it be done outside of the Government Printing Office?

Mr. DINGLEY. I am offering no amendments now; I am making suggestions. Mr. BELTZHOOVER. I will be glad to have the gentleman cooperate with me in that matter.

Mr. DINGLEY. But as to blanks and blank books, used regularly from year to year in all the Departments-the blanks the custom-houses, for internal-revenue offices, for the Post-Office, indeed all blanks and blank books which are fixed in their character and may be printed in large quantities—that work might be done just as well outside the Government Printing Office as in it. I have not a particle of doubt that there could be some saving effected by giving this work to the lowest bidder.

Of course, as gentlemen remember, and as the gentleman from Tennessee has reminded us, we tried before the war the experi-Tennessee has reminded us, we tried before the war the experiment of having all our printing done by contract, and maintaining no Government Printing Office; and, as the gentleman from Tennessee well said yesterday, that system was a failure. Contracts were given out for political purposes, and, as gentlemen very well understand who have read the testimony taken by the Joint Committee on Printing, the result was that the Government expended, proportionately, a larger sum for work done than is expended under the present system, and there were frauds in connection with it that reflected upon the Government of the Government expended under the present system.

Therefore I say in the first place we must maintain a Government Printing Office for exigency work; there is no escape from that. The only question is whether, as to certain classes of work called for by the Departments, namely, blanks and blank books, we might not advantageously give out the work by contract to the lowest hidder just as we have given out the minimum for the the lowest bidder just as we have given out the printing for the money order division of the Post-Office Department since 1883 to the lowest bidder. There is no question that there can be some saving in that direction. I think that this in a nutshell is a statement of the whole case.

[Here the hammer fell].
Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Does the gentleman desire more time? If so, I will submit the request.

Mr. DINGLEY. No; I think I will not occupy more time.

Mr. BLACK of Georgia. I would like to ask the gestleman from Maine a question.

Mr. DINGLEY. I am perfectly willing to answer, so far as I in, if I may be allowed the time.

Mr. BLACK of Georgia. The gentleman seems well-informed on this subject; and there are others of us who have not had as much experience as he has. I understood the gentleman to say that the Government pays 20 per cent more than is paid by private partie

Mr. DINGLEY. As wages?
Mr. BLACK of Georgia. Yes, sir.
Mr. DINGLEY. Nearly that—certainly 10 per cent more.

Mr. DINGLEY. Nearly that—certainly 10 per cent more. And the fact that so many printers come here to obtain situations—just as they come for Government positions—indicates that the pay is better than elsewhere.

Mr. BLACK of Georgia. Why is that?

Mr. DINGLEY. By reason of the enactments of Congress. Congress has passed a law providing what shall be the compensation of employés in the Government Printing Office. It has also provided that the hours of labor shall be but eight hours daily, while in the private offices of the country the hours of daily labor are ten. daily labor are ten.

Mr. BLACK of Georgia. Well, can not we correct that? I beg leave to ask the gentleman from Maine this question as a learner altogether. He has had much experience, and I ask him if in his judgment we ought not to correct that?

Mr. DINGLEY. Well, the gentleman may undertake it, but I am afraid he would fail. I have seen some efforts of that kind made in the House, and I know their practical result.

Mr. BLACK of Georgia. I understand you to state, however,

Mr. BLACK of Georgia. I understand you to state, nowever, as a fact that we pay 20 per cent more than the private establishments pay for this work?

Mr. DINGLEY. Ten per cent at least. I give that as my opinion, without having carefully compared the compensation.

Mr. BLACK of Georgia. I understand that, of course; it is an estimate.

Mr. DINGLEY. When I undertake to make a statement of that kind I mean that I give what I regard as a fair estimate, or what might be called a rough guess. I should say it was substantially that. It is, however, but just in that connection that I should say the Government Printing Office requires a class of expert workmen of a higher grade on the average than those required in any private establishment. It has no apprentices. They can not have, from the necessities of the case, any poor workmen; and, of course, experts in any branch of mechanical employment command higher prices. This office employs the very best. I will not undertake to say that private establishments employing a like grade of operatives do not pay nearly as much, but as a matter of fact, I take it for granted that the Government Printing Office employs only the very best class of workmen—those whom you might call experts—and I doubt if that is the case in any private printing establishment.

There has been some reflection on the character of the work done at the Government Printing Office. I have had some ex-perience myself in the matter of printing and know something about it. I say then that the character of the printing done at the Government Printing Office, in general, can not be surpassed by any office in this country—as might be expected from an office employing experts. I have had speeches printed in private offices here in this city and also in the Government Printing Offices here in this city and also in the Government Printing Offices and the private of the pri ing Office, and any gentleman who has an eye for good typography must understand that the work done at the Government Printing Office is very far superior to that done at ordinary offices where cheaper workmen are employed. There is no doubt

We have no cause to complain of the character of the work done We have no cause to complain of the character of the work done there. The office is managed efficiently by good men, thoroughly understanding their duty, and I do not believe it is possible to have it managed better than it is managed now. It is just and proper that I should say that much. We have never had a more efficient Government Printer and superintendent of the office than we have to-day.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of submit-

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of submit-ting some remarks on the pending question I move to strike out the last word.

I had the honor during one session of Congress to serve on the Committee on Printing of this House, and during that Congress—the Forty-seventh—I had occasion to examine into the workings of this great office of the Government.

Ordinarily I am in favor of letting Government work out to the lowest responsible bidder, but the Government Printing Ofthe lowest responsible bluder, but the Government Printing Office is an exception to all rules, and I will venture to assert that if we undertake to do the public printing by letting it out to private parties, to the lowest bidder, that it will cost us very much more money than we are now paying, and we will get, in my judgment, far inferior work. It is impossible in the very my judgment, as that private individuals can do this Govern-nature of things that private individuals can do this Govern-nature of things. It is an utter impossibility. There is no private ment work. It is an utter impossibility. There is no private printing establishment on this continent that can take hold of the Government printing and under the rules that prevail in private offices do that work for the Government, and do it as well or as cheaply as it is now done.

Take the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for instance. we have both Houses adjourn on account of the death of a member or from other causes, and there is nothing to be done. Another day the Senate will meet and be in session late at night, and the House will also hold a night session running until 10 or 11 o'clock, an immense mass of work is thrown on the office to be discharged, and yet it comes to the mambers' tables before 8 o'clock in the morning, efficiently executed in a style which surpasses all of the highest achievements of the printing art known to mankind under such circumstances. There is no such establishment in the world, and the work can not be done anywhere else but in the Government Printing Office. Why? Because when there is a great pressure of work on the Record they can Because do it by taking the book and job men and putting them on duty. do it by taking the cook and job men and putting them on ditty. When there is little work on the RECORD they can go back to the other branches of the service, and by this means have a great establishment always employed, but with a force of men capable of being used for any class of work that may be presented. They can be transferred from one department of the work to the other as their services are required.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Will the gentlemen allow a question?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes.
Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Do you know that the employés of the RECORD have nothing to do with the other departments of the Printing Office?

Mr. SPRINGER. I know that the employés in the other parts of the Government Printing Office can be turned to this work when necessary.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Do you not know that they are not? Mr. SPRINGER. I know that the printers can be transferred in sufficient numbers to do the work in any department of the Printing Office at the time that their services are required. I say there is a force of men who can be always used in this way that no private establishment could afford to employ. It would be impossible for them to do so, having so large a reserve force to call on to meet an emergency.

It is known that this is work, as a rule, that must be done promptly, and in the best style of workmanship. That is one of the things that Congress must have done. We can not afford de-lay; we can not afford to be kept out of the public printing from day to day. If Congress is deprived of the printing necessary for the discharge of its duty it would greatly delay and embarrass the public business.

We are never delayed. This work is done promptly and efficiently, and in the very best style known to the art. If we depart from this system, and undertake to beat contractors by getting them to do work for less than the Government is doing it, the Government will be the loser in every instance, and these contracts will be let as a matter of patronage and favoritism to contracts will be let as a matter of patronage and favoritism to individuals, and will be a fruitful source of public scandal.

Let us let well enough alone. This Printing Office is well enough. The real complaint, if any can be offered, is that we have been printing many kinds of documents in too great excess. That is the fault of Congress, and not of the Printing Office.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. And that is largely remaided by this bill edied by this bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. And that very objection is being overcome

Mr. SPRINGER. And that very objection is being overcome by the legislation covered in the pending bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. That is it exactly.

Mr. SPRINGER. And we are indebted to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON], the chairman of the Committee on Printing, for inaugurating and bringing nearly to completion in this House, one of the greatest and most beneficent reforms that Congress has entered upon for many versus cent reforms that Congress has entered upon for many years; and I hope the gentleman will be successful in passing this bill in substantially the shape in which it has been introduced.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Now, I hope we may have yote on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania

[Mr. Beltzhoover].
The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Add to section 90 the following: "And all blanks, blank books, and printed rengraved matter of every kind whatsoever supplied by the Secretary of tate, the Secretary of the Treagury, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secre tary of War, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Postmaster-General, and the Attorney-General, to any of the employes or bureaus under them, or used by them in their Departments, shall be obtained from the lowest responsible bidders for furnising printed and engraved matter respectively, under separate advertisements calling for proposals to furnish the same for a period of four years under such conditions as such Secretaries and the Postmaster-General and the Attorney-General may prescribe: Provided, That the Public Printer and the Chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing of the Treasury Department shall submit respectively estimates of the cost of printing such printed and engraved matter as may be required for use in the said Departments of the Government, and they shall furnish such printed and engraved matter whenever upon their estimates of the cost of the expenditure thereof will be less than upon proposals made as above provided for."

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I did not quite understand whether the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BELTZHOOVER] has modified this, so as to cover simply blanks and blank books.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It has not been modified. Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee.

Mr. DINGLEY. That never will answer. If it was confined simply to blanks and blank books, it would be less objectionable.
Mr. BELTZHOOVER. I intend to offer that amendment next.

The amendment was rejected. Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Now Now I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to section 90 the following: "And all blanks and blank books of every kind whatsoever supplied by the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Postmas er-General, and the Attorney-General, to any of the employed; or bureaus under them, or used by them in their Departments, shall be obtained from the lowest responsible bidders for fornishing printed matter under separate advertisements calling for proposals to furnish the same for a period of four years under such conditions as such Secretaries and the Postmaster-General and the Attorney-General may prescribe: Provided, That the Public Printer shall submit estimates of the cost of printing such blanks and blank books as may be required for use in the said Departments of the Government, and he shall furnish such blanks and blank books whenever upon his estimates of the cost of the expenditure thereof will be less than upon proposals made as above provided for.

The CHAIRMAN Theorems in the said to the cost of the co

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Just a word. The amendment as I now offer it, meets the request of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] exactly, and provides only for blanks and blank

I want to say but a word in answer to what the gentleman said in reply to me. While it seems to me that it ought to be the rule that the gentleman who maintains the affirmative of a proposition ought always to have the right to conclude, this body is an exception to that rule, and the gentlemen who oppose a proposition invariably have the conclusion.

But let me say to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] that in what I offered yesterday I had not the slightest intention to reflect upon the administration of the Government Printing Office. I am in favor of maintaining that intact. I am in favor of maintaining it in perfection, so as to compute as entirely and or maintaining it in perfection, so as to compare as entirely and fairly as possible with private printers. I want the Government Printing Office to do all the Congressional printing, the printing which comes by exigency, which we can not estimate for, which we can not provide for in advance; but I intended my amendment only to cover departmental printing.

It will not interfere with the Government Printing Office. The great bulk of the departmental printing consists of blanks and blank books, which can be printed a year in advance just as well as not; and experience has shown that they can be printed by competition without interfering with the Government Printing

This does not interfere with the wages of the Government printers. It does not interfere with the management of the Government Printing Office. It does not in any way destroy the Government Printing Office, as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Richardson] contended it would. On the contrary, it simply supplements their work by putting that which can be done outside in the hands of parties who will do it without the expensive surroundings and environments of the Government Printing Office.
Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has now modified his amendment, and I am free to say that he has cut off some of what were the most objectionable features of the amendment he offered; but he must now, it seems to me, concede, after the statement he has just made, when he says that it will not interfere with the Printing Office, that if it is not to interfere with the Printing Office he can not accomplish that great work of reform he desires.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. I can not see why it will interfere any more with the Government Printing Office than the action of the Postmaster-General for eleven years under the act of 1883. At the beginning of the term of the Public Printer for four years this work is let out, and he would not have to provide for performing this character of work.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I did not understand the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] to request that such an amendment as this should be offered, but he suggested that it would be less objectionable. Now, Mr. Chairman, if such a reform as this is to be instituted, it ought to be done in some separate measure. It should be done in a bill to be referred to some committee, I care not which; it may be to the committee of which the gentleman is chairman, or to the Committee on Public Printing, or to any committee that will hear expert testimony. And if they should deem it wise to report such a bill, let it be reported back to the House, and if such a measure is to be adopted, let it be discussed properly, and not put in under the five-minute debate a matter that is of so much importance as that in this

I would rather that my friend should institute his reform in some measure introduced separately. If it be a reform, let it stand upon its own merit, and let us have time to examine and consider it closely; because if we are going to endeavor to secure cheaper preparation of blank books than can be done at the Government Printing Office, it ought to be done in some wise legislation, not passed hurriedly, so as to prevent fraud and corruption, if there be any, or if there be any temptation to commit fraud, it should be considered in such a way as to give ample op-portunity to throw the proper safeguards around it. Therefore I hope the Committee of the Whole will not vote this amend-

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Yes, sir.
Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Was not this testimony upon which I am relying before your committee on your investigation?
Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. No, sir; we did not investigate this question. That matter was put in the report; that tigate this question. That matter was put in the report; that is, the letter of the Postmaster-General was put in the report, and the question was not investigated. We did not undertake to see whether we could institute a reform in that direction or not

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. You are not answering my question. Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I am trying to do so.
Mr. BELTZHOOVER. I desire to know if the letter or testimony of Postmaster-General Wanamaker was not before your committee when you were making this investigation.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Certainly it was.
Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Now, was not this question brought up in the last Congress and elaborately debated, just as it is now,

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I think not. Mr. BELTZHOOVER. On the same amendment? Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I think not.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER, And consumed about a whole day?
Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I do not know that it did.
If the gentleman says so I will accept his statement. It has not It has not been considered by a committee of this House. No measure which contemplated providing for the reforms he claims will re-No measure sult from this amendment have been considered by any committee of this House

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Pardon me; that you have already

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Yes

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. You were considering this question before you reported the present bill to this Congress. This question was discussed here the last Congress for half a day. Why did you not consider it when you were bringing in a genral printing bill?
Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It is very easy to ask questions

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. It is very easy to answer them. Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. We have considered almost everything in connection with this matter, and we have omitted to consider this in the connection that the gentleman speaks of it. I am sorry if we have not considered anything that we ought to have considered. I agree that there is much to be considered in the matter of details concerning printing reforms, and it may be that we have passed over something that should be considered, but I promise that if any such measure as the gentleman suggests is reported it shall receive close scrutiny and careful attention, and if there can be a reform made in that direction and a dollar saved I am in favor of it, but I am not in favor of attempting it hurriedly here.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. I will ask the gentleman if this principle has not been in operation since 1884 down to this hour successfully and for the benefit of the Government?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Perhaps so. The gentle-man says it has been in operation in some degree for the Post-Office Department; but it is one matter for one little Department, or one big Department, of this Government to make a contract for certain blank books that it may require and quite another thing for all the great Departments and bureaus of this Govern-ment to undertake to do the same thing. The difficulty becomes magnified eight times or ten times over when you undertake to apply this plan to all the printing required for all the Departments. I trust that the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. RAY. Mr. Chairman, I can not see how there can be possible reform or saving by the adoption of this amendment. As I understand the working of the Government Printing Office, we have there a large number of men, several hundred, engaged and paid by the Government. As has been said by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], some days they have emergency work which occupies the entire force actively night and day, and overhours; then, again, Congress is not in session, or is in session for so short a time that the work on the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and on the documents that are nec sary to be printed when Congress is in session, is greatly reduced.

Now, it seems to me, that on such occasions the same men who otherwise would have been employed upon Congressional work can be employed in working upon these blanks for the use of the different Departments, and if their labor were not used in that way, either the men would be thrown out of employment at such times, or they would be idle, though paid by the Government, and at the same time we should be paying some contractor for the work which they might have done. That is how the matter strikes me

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Has the gentleman ever made inquiry as to the basis of fact for the hypothesis on which he argues? Does he know that those who work on departmental work and those who work on the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD are separate and independent forces?

Well, if it be true that in the Government Printing Office the men who work on the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD do not do anything else-Mr. BELTZHOOVER.

That is the fact.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. No, that is not the case.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Yes, it is.
Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. No. It is so, of course, while they are working on the RECORD, but not at other times.
Mr. RAY. Well, I want to say that if the Printing Office of this great Government is carried on upon any such basis as that suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the whole thing ought to be abolished, and the managers of it, instead of being wise and good men working in the interest of the Government, are simply idiots, so far as that business is concerned.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Do you know that the skilled workmen employed on the documents and those employed on the RECORD require different kinds of knowledge and experience?

Mr. RAY I have that it does not be a superience?

Mr. RAY. I know that it does not require any different kind of knowledge or skill to set type for the printing of a blank or a blank book from that which is required to set type for a page in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The man that can do the one can do the other if he is fit to be employed in the Government Printing Office. Mr. SPRINGER.

Mr. SPRINGER. And they do both kinds of work.
Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Does not the gentleman know the fact that they are not transferred from one work to the other?
Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I assert here as fact, which I know to be correct, that the men who work on the RECORD do work in the document room when the

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Occasionally.
Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. When the RECORD is not being printed. When the RECORD is being printed of course they do not.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. They do occasionally; but the rule is just as I say.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Oh, no.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Yes it is.
Mr. RAY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee whether it is not the intention of the Public Printer to keep all of the employes at work all the time-that is, the usual working

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Unquestionably; and they transfer the employés of one division to another in order to do

Mr. RAY. So I supposed.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. BeltzHOOVER, the Chairman declared that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 7, noes 45.

So the amendment was rejected. The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 03. The heads of Executive Departments, and such executive officers as are not connected with the Departments, respectively, shall cause daily examinations of the Cognessional Record for the purpose of noting documents, reports, and other publications of interest to their Departments and shall cause an immediate order to be sent to the Public Printer for the number of copies of such publications required for official use, not to exceed, however, the number of bureaus in the Department and divisions in the office of the head thereof. The Public Printer shall send to each Executive Department and to each executive office not connected with the Departments, as soon as printed, 5 copies of all beils and resolutions. When the head of a Department desires a greater number of any class of bills or resolutions for official use, they shall be furnished by the Public Printer on Equisition promptly made.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend section 93 by adding after the word "resolutions" in line 13, the following: "except the State Department, to which shall be sent 10 copies of bills and resolutions."

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. That is simply to make the number 10 for the State Department instead of 5.

The amendment was adopted. The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 99. The Postmaster-General shall contract for all envelopes, stamped or otherwise, designed for sale to the public, or for use by his own or other Departments, and may contract for them to be plain or with such printed matter as may be prescribed by the Department making requisition therefor: Provided, That no envelope furnished by the Government shall contain any business address or advertisement.

Mr. LOUD. I move to amend by striking out the proviso to this section

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I do not object to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 102. All future orders or requisitions for printing or binding shall be governed by the provisions of this act; and all printing, binding, and other work required for the Senate and House of Representatives, or the committees and officers thereof, together with the material necessary to such work, shall be turnished by the Public Printer on requisition of the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives: Provided, That each Senate and Representative shall be entitled to the binding in halfmorocco, or material no more expensive, of but one copy of each public document to which he may be entitled, an account of which, with each Senator and Representative, shall be kept by the Secretary and Clerk, respectively: And provided further, That in printing preliminary reports and other papers for the use of committees no more than fifty copies shall be ordered unless expressly authorized by the Committee on Printing of each House, respectively. No Government publications shall be delivered to officers and employées of Congress except for the use of members thereof, unless authorized by this act or upon requisition approved by the Joint Committee on Printing.

Mr. BRODERICK. I move to amend by inserting as section 103 the provision which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 103. That there shall be printed and bound at the Government Printing Office 30,000 extra copies of the Compendium of the Eleventh Census in three parts; 10.000 for the use of the Senate, and 20,000 for the use of the House of Representatives.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make against this amendment the same point of order that I made the I do not think it is in order to provide for the printing of a temporary publication on a bill which is intended to provide for the printing of the permanent annual reports of the Departments. I must insist that this bill is not intended to provide for temporary publications of the Government.

I ask attention further to this point: The Committee on Printing has not jurisdiction of this question of the publication of matters connected with the census; they are not germane to this bill. I beg the attention of the Chair to the fact that the this bill. I beg the attention of the Chair to the fact that the House has deliberately referred this question of printing for the census to the Committee on Appropriations. This very proposition by the action of the House has been referred to that committee. The House settled this question more than a week ago by referring without objection to the Committee on Appropriations a proposition to print the Compendium of the Eleventh

Those are as many as I want—enough, it seems to me, for any member of the House. But here comes a proposition for an increased number of the House.

ber, although each of us has already 81 copies for distribution
Mr. SAYERS. Has the gentleman made a point of order upon

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I have made a point of order. I insist that this is a matter belonging to the Committee on Appropriations, and ought not to be offered as an amendment to this bill.

Mr. SAYERS. I desire to suggest to the Chair that there being no committee on the census and the Appropriations Committee having been charged with the making of appropriations in connection with the census, any proposition affecting the publication of matters connected with the census ought to go to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BRODERICK. I would like to say a word—
The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order

Mr. BRODERICK. Mr. Chairman, I assented to the reference of a proposition on this subject to the Committee on Appropriations; but because that reference has been made and the proposition is pending before that committee, there is no reason why an amendment should not be submitted to this bill so as to make proper provision in the matter. Doubtless the publication proposed in the amendment is going to be made. The Government has expended nearly $10,000,000 already in gathering data for the Eleventh Census. The volume on the subject which has been most demanded by the people throughout the country is the compendium of the census, which is being published in Is the compendium of the census, which is being published in three parts. So far as I have been able to ascertain (and I have made inquiry) no member has enough copies of this work to supply the demand. I believe that extra copies will be provided; and if they are to be, why not authorize the publication now?

I was perfectly willing the matter should go to the Committee on Appropriations: but the question involved here is a question of time. To facilitate the publication of this work I now ask that this amendment be incorporated in the bill as a new section. So far as the point of order is concerned. I believe the Chair

So far as the point of order is concerned, I believe the Chair ruled the other day that any matter relating to printing was germane to this bill. I am willing to submit the question of order without further discussion.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The House having taken jurisdiction of this matter and solemnly referred it to the Committee on Appropriations, it is one which does not belong here. The Committee of the Whole, it seems to me, has no right to reverse the action of the Hous

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Did the gentleman say he received a notice that 81 copies of this work stand to his credit?
Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Yes, sir.

One gentleman here received a notice Mr. BELTZHOOVER. that he had 69 to his credit; the number belonging to me according to my notice is 77

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I presume you have sent

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. No; this notice purports to give the whole number to which I am entitled.
Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I do not know how that can be, unless there has been a mistake in the count.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. This is a question of some import-

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I have no doubt the division has been equitably made.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. But the question is, How many copies are we entitled to?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Eighty-one, I believe, was

Mr. Richardson of Tenlessee. Engaryone, restere, was the number stated on my notice.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. A gentleman near me says that he received a notice naming 71 copies.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I may be mistaken in my recollection of the number named in my notice.

Mr. Chairman, I hope my friend from Kansas [Mr. BRODER-ICK] will not insist on his proposition to insert this amendment. He knows the vast work which our committee has bestowed on this bill, and I appeal to him as a colaborer in this great work to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. BRODERICK. Mr. Chairman, I have no disposition to defeat or hamper this bill. I believe it is a good one. It is one, I think, that has been desired; a majority of the members of the last Congress were really in its favor, and a majority, I believe, of the members of the present Congress. If, then, this amendment is going to weigh down the bill I will withdraw it.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amend-

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Has the last section of the bill been read?
The CHAIRMAN. It has not.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. I have prepared an amendment to section 102, which I will send up to the desk and have read. It may be, after I have heard a statement from the gentleman from Tennessee, which I shall ask for, I may not desire to offer it. The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The a The Clerk read as follows:

On page 61, in line 8, strike out the proviso, down to and including the word respectively," in line 13.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Now, if the chairman of the committee will give me his attention for a moment. I offer that amendment not knowing exactly the meaning of the language of the section, whether as it stands, and the bill be adopted, it will prevent our having but one copy of any document bound. If that is the meaning of the section I desire to propose the amend-ment. If that is not the meaning there will be no occasion for It seemed to me, however, from my reading the amendment.

of the bill that that was the meaning of it.

The words I propose to strike out are those beginning in line 8 with "provided" down to and including the word "respectively "in line 13:

Provided, That each Senator and Representative shall be entitled to the binding in half morocco, or material no more expensive, of but one copy of each public document to which he may be entitled, an account of which with each Senator and Representative, shall be kept by the Secretary and Clerk, respectively.

It seemed to me that if the law is to be as it has been hereto-fore, and that public documents shall be bound in the ordinary binding as we have had them heretofore, this provise should be stricken out. As I understand this section, if it is adopted, it will not permit us to have but one copy of any one document bound. If such is the case, I do not believe it will meet with the approval of the members of this House, and to remedy that the amendment has been suggested.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. In what respect does the gentleman quote "the law as it now stands?" He says he wants it to remain as it now stands. How is it now?

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. I suppose the chairman of the committee knows mittee knows.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I do know, but I wished to see if I understood the gentleman's idea correctly.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Well, take for instance the Congressional Record. We are entitled to the binding, for our own use, of one copy. Then such of the daily Records as are not sent out, but which remain to the credit of the members at the time of the elege of Congress, we bound in the ordinary hind.

the time of the close of Congress, are bound in the ordinary bind ing; and so with reference to a good many other documents.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I understand now the point of the gentleman. This, I will state to him, does not apply to the RECORD at all. It does not change the existing law, except it provides that a member may have a document bound in material no more expensive than the ordinary binding, that is, half morocco. Each member is only entitled now to one copy, and this provides that he may change the binding so as to get it in binding not more expensive than that already provided by law

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Very well. I offered the amendment so as to get an explanation of this provision. With the state-ment of the gentleman from Tennessee I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. PICKLER. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee to state wherein this section 102 changes existing law as to the right of members to have documents bound? I ask him to state fully the changes, if any.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It makes no changes except to provide that a member may take binding not more expensive than that now provided by law.

Mr. PICKLER. That is the only change?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will continue the reading of Mr. COFFEEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask a question Mr. COFFEEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask a question with reference to section 102, the same point that the gentleman from South Dakota referred to. I think I understood in the beginning of the discussion of this bill from the chairman of the Committee on Printing, that at present the law provides that each member may have one copy, in good binding, of all documents printed during his term of service. Has he the same privilege under this bill? If not so, what is the difference?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. There is no difference.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. There is no difference. He has all of the privileges of binding that the other law conveyed, and this gives him the same right of binding in other material not more expensive than that already provided by law. Mr. COFFEEN. Well, am I not correct in my memory that it was explained in this bill during the discussion that it cuts off members from having two copies of public documents? As I understood the gentleman he said they get but one.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. No, the gentleman did not so understand me.

Mr. COFFEEN. I do not refer to the Congressional Rec-ORD, but to all documents.

PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments joint resolution (H. Res. 34) providing for the disposition of certain personal property and money now in the hands of a receiver of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-bay Saints, appointed by the supreme court of Utuh. and authorizing its application to the charitable purposes of said church; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

PUBLIC PRINTING AND BINDING.

The committee again resumed its session (Mr. Dockery in the

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee.
Mr. RICHARDSON of every put The law gives each mem-Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The law gaves call member of Congress one copy of every public document printed while he is in Congress, and this simply provides a method of binding. It does not cut down what you are allowed, and it does not increase it. You are allowed one copy, bound in any style to suit yourself, provided it is not more expensive than that now allowed by law, as this section provides. Now, the law gives you a second copy, unbound, if you want it; but whether you take the unbound copy or not, they give you one bound copy of every publication printed while you are in office.

Mr. CÔFFEEN. Do I understand that this bill does not limit the number, as compared to the former law?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It does limit it, unless a gentleman desires the publications sent. If he wants every publications sent. gentleman desires the publications sent. If he wants every publication, he can get it; but this law will not force him to take it when he does not want it. That is the provision of this bill.

Mr. COFFEEN. It appears that there is something inconsistent in the bill, when compared with the explanation made in the beginning.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. If the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] will yield to me, I will call his attention to the matter that is in the mind of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. COFFEEN]. It is this: Does the bill, by the clause now under consideration, cut off those documents which we receive from the Clerk's document room bound in sheepskin?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It does not, unless a gentleman desires them not to come. If he wants them to come and says so, then he gets them, and one copy of each publication will be sent to him; but it will not be sent to him if he does not bound in sheepskin?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Can he in addition to that get one copy

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. If a gentleman desires to have one pamphlet copy bound, he can take it and have it bound in any kind of binding at a cost not to exceed the cost of half Mr. COFFEEN. In addition to the one bound copy that is sent to him?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. In addition to that.

Mr. COFFEEN. Can we do so under this bill.
Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Yes, we can.
Mr. MEIKLEJOHN. May I inquire of the chairman of the committee if he will allow us to recur to section 53, for the purpose which I will state? The section as passed provides that the stereotype and electrotype plates be sold at the cost of the metal and making, and it further provides that the publications made by the Government shall not be copyrighted. The change I de-sire to make, in asking to recur to the section, is that the stereotype and electrotype plates may be sold for the entire cost, and also that publishers be prevented from copyrighting the reproductions from the duplicate stereotype plates.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. If my friend will give me that amendment I will use my best endeavors to have it put on in the Senate or in Congress. I do not want to recur to the sec-tion, because there are other sections which gentlemen may wish to recur to, and that will involve us in interminable debate. I am in sympathy with the gentleman. I agree that his amendment ought to be adopted, and I will try to have it put into the

I want to say, Mr. Chairman, now that we have concluded the debate upon this bill, that I desire to thank the House for its kindness and indulgence. I want to say that I have done the best I can in the framing of this printing bill, and I ask now that we have a vote upon it

There has been nothing added to the bill except two matters of temporary publication, while the bill in its main provisions deals with the permanent publications, which will continue to be made year after year. This bill systematizes the law, and puts it into good shape, as we think. The little temporary increase, if there be such, only applies to one session of Congress, while the great economies in the bill will extend on and on, year of the very such as the such as the property of the such as the such as the property of the such as the property of the such as the property of the such as the such as the property of the such as the s

PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills and resolutions of the following titles were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. DALZELL: A bill (H. R. 4201) to regulate and suppress the production and emission of smoke from bituminous coal and to provide penalties for the violation thereof within the city of Washington-to the Committee on the District of Columbia

By Mr. STONE of Kentucky: A bill (H. R. 4202) to settle and adjust the claims of any State for expenses incurred by it in defense of the United States—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. CAMINETTI: A bill (H. R. 4203) making conditional grants of lands and lakes to the State of California, and counties and irrigation districts therein, for storage reservoirs for irrigating, mining, manufacturing, or any industrial or other useful purpose—to the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands.

Also, a bill (H. R. 4204) to amend section 2335 of the Revised Statutes—to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

By Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania: A joint resolution (H. Res. 78) tendering the thanks of Congress to Capt. J. H. Gillig—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

PRIVATE BILLS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills of the following titles were presented and referred as follows:

By Mr. COMPTON (by request): A bill (H. R. 4206) for the relief of Thomas Hynes—to the Committee on Claims.

J. H. AND J. B. ABINGTON VS. THE UNITED STATES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a copy of the finding of the Court of Claims in the case of J. H. and J. B. Abington, administrators, vs. The United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

CERTAIN PROPERTY OF THE MORMON CHURCH.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a joint resolution (H Res. 34) providing for the disposition of certain property and money now in the hands of a receiver of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, appointed by the supreme court of Utah, and authorizing its application to the charitable purposes of said church, with amendments of the Senate thereto.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SAYERS. I hope, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman will explain the nature of the amendments.*

Mr. RAWLINS. The original joint resolution provided that this personal property should be restored, to be applied to the charitable purposes of the church generally. The Senate amendment simply provides that it shall be applied to certain charitable purposes; that is to say, the payment of the debts for which the church is legally or equitably liable, the relief of poor and distressed members, the education of the children of such most. tressed members, the education of the children of such members, and the building and repair of houses of worship, provided that the rightfulness of the practice of polygamy shall not be inculcated in such places of worship. It does not change the substance of the original joint resolution as it passed the House, and therefore I ask that it be concurred in.

Mr. DINGLEY. The Senate amendment simply directs the distribution of this fund?

Mr. RAWLINS. That is all.

Mr. RAY. And the purposes enumerated in the amendment.

Mr. RAY. And the purposes enumerated in the amendment

Mr. RAWLINS. Yes, sir. It conforms to the intention of those whose labor created the money and who gave it to the church to be dispensed under the direction of the leaders of the church for charitable purposes. The amendment specifies the purposes as I have recited them, and simply carries out the original intention. This property belongs to charity and was intended for the identical charitable purposes to which it is now proposed to be applied. The joint resolution carries into effect the intent of those who gave the money, while it does not per-mit it to be used for any unlawful purpose. The money is now being wasted in litigation.

Mr. REED. What is the amount involved?
Mr. RAWLINS. It was $237,000 a while ago. I do not know exactly what the amount is now.

Mr REED. A deserving profession has got some of it, I suppose. [Laughter.] Mr. RAWLINS.

Mr. RAWLINS. Yes, sir. I ask for a vote.
The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution.

The Senate amendments were concurred in.
Mr. RAWLINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendments to the joint resolution were concurred in, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I wish to know whether the first thing in order is not the bill which came over from Saturday afternoon with the previous question ordered

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. HEARD. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee to withhold his demand for the regular order for a moment.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Very well.

Mr. HEARD. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the bill which I send to the desk (H. R. 913) for the relief of Toyle I. Williams. Louis L. Williams.

The bill was read.

Mr. HEARD. I can explain the object of this bill in two minutes. Mr. Williams was appointed by the Governor of Alaska utes. Mr. Williams was appointed by the Governor of Alaska to represent that Territory as a commissioner at the World's F_4 ir. At the time he presented his voucher for payment there was some doubt as to whether Alaska would be entitled to a representative receiving pay. The money was withheld and the question was referred to the Attorney-General, who found that the Alaska commissioner was entitled to be paid. He has not got his pay, and this simply authorizes the Treasury to pay him the property which the Attorney-General has found to be due him or which the Attorney-General has found to be due him on that first voucher.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HEARD] for the present consideration

Mr. KILGORE. I am inclined to object to that, Mr. Speaker. This is the beginning of paying the expenses of the World's

Mr. HEARD. This does not involve any extra expense at all. Mr. KILGORE. What is it, then?
Mr. HEARD. I have explained, but I will explain again. This commissioner presented his voucher for payment, but at that time there was some doubt as to whether the commissioner from Alaska was entitled to be paid.

The question was referred to the Attorney-General and his opinion is clear in favor of the title of this party, but he has not been paid

Mr. KILGORE. Why not pay him out of the fund already appropriated for such payments?

Mr. HEARD. The Secretary of the Treasury finds that he has no authority without the passage of this act to make payment.

Mr. KILGORE. But there have been appropriations made.

Mr. HEARD. But none, it seems, that covered this case. It

This gentleman has been kept out of the use perfectly just. of his money for two years. He certainly ought to be paid.

Mr. KILGORE. But if Alaska was entitled to representation, and other persons have been paid, I can not understand why this provision is necessary to make payment in this case. It ought to be paid from the same fund.

Mr. HEARD. Because, as I have stated, the Secretary of the Treasury finds that there is no appropriation out of which to pay it without this enactment.

Mr. KILGORE. Well, I will object to it this morning anyhow and look into it hereafter. I do not believe in beginning on compensation for World's Fair people at this time.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, returned with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives for printing the hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means.

REVENUE CUTTER FOR LAKE SERVICE.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at fifteen minutes before 1 o'clock. There is pending in this hour a bill reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, House bill No. 3297, providing for the construction of a steam revenue cutter for service tee of the Whole. vice on the Great Lakes. This bill is in Commit-

Mr. MALLORY. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to resume the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. Dockery in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3297) providing for the construction of a steam revenue cutter for service on the Great Lakes.

Mr. SAYERS. I wish to inquire whether the amendment reported by the committee to this bill has been adopted?

Mr. MALLORY. I do not know whether it has been or not, I would like to have that information from the Chair.
The CHAIRMAN. The general debate is not yet closed. The amendment reported by the committee has not yet been voted on.

Mr. MALLORY. Unless some gentleman wishes to address the committee-

Mr. LOUD rose

Mr. MALLORY. Does the gentleman from California wish to speak on this question?
Mr. LOUD. Yes, sir.
Mr. MALLORY. How much time does the gentleman wish?

Mr. LOUD. Five minutes.
Mr. MALLORY. I yield the gentleman five minutes.
Mr. LOUD. I send to the desk a substitute which I desire to offer for the pending bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is authorized to have constructed a steam revenue cutter of the first class for service on the Great Lakes: Provided, That the cost of said construction shall not exceed the sum of $175,000.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to have constructed a revenue cutter for service in the harbor of San Francisco, State of California: Provided, That the cost of said construction shall not exceed the sum of $50,000.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to raise a point of order as to that substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SAYERS. The point of order is that the substitute which has been offered proposes to add another bill, and to add to the bill the construction of another vessel.

Mr. LOUD. I would like to state that it is offered regularly, in the form of a substitute, covering exactly the same subject, and only including in it another provision.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman propose to offer this as a substitute for the other bill, by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting this?

Mr. LOUD. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that is in order.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, if the Chair rules that substitute to be in order, I would like some explanation from the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] as to the substitute.

Mr. LOUD. I have the floor for that purpose, and I ask the gentleman to listen for a moment. I understand the committee have already reported substantially the same measure that I have proposed here as an amendment to this bill. There is a vessel needed in the harbor of San Francisco quite as much as it is needed upon the Great Lakes. The vessel that is there now can not be sent outside of the bar for the purpose of placing officers on vessels, and it is safe to assert that every year there is smuggled into the port of San Francisco, by reason of throwing opium overboard from vessels before they reach the harbor, more than $50,000 worth of opium. You must remember that San Francisco, by reason of its being the principal port of entry for opium, needs revenue vessels more than any other port in the United States, because opium is as valuable as silver, and the incentive for smuggling is greater than the incentive to smuggle any other article that is brought into the United States.

Now, I am free to confess to this House that I should not have endeavored to entangle this bill providing a cutter for the Great Lakes with this amendment if I had not heard remarks uttered privately upon the floor, which do not appear in the RECORD of the debate, to the effect that gentiemen might consent to al-low the vessel to be built for the Great Lakes, but that they proposed to stop there.

Now, of course, we have not as many votes on the Pacific coast as there are bordering upon the Great Lakes, and hence we can not command as much support here as the Great Lakes can; but as this is a perfectly just measure, one that has been demanded as this is a perioday just measure, one that has been demanded for years, I can not see why this House can not make one job of the two vessels and meet the demands of the service.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that the gentleman has thought proper to make an effort to incorporate this bill for the San Francisco boarding boat with the bill for this vessel for the Great Lakes.

Mr. LOUD. I should not have done so if it had not been for marks which I heard made in this House, the purport of which

Mr. MALLORY. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the substitute, because it simply complicates this matter, and may possibly result in the defeat of this measure for a revenue cutter on the lakes, which is a matter of great importance.

Mr. LOUD. No greater than ours.
Mr. MALLORY. There is no question whatever, I think, in the mind of any gentleman here, that it is absolutely necessary that there should be a new cutter on Lakes Michigan and Superior. There is an immense line of coast there that is unguarded, and the vessel that is in service there now is in a condition that is absolutely unsafe. As between the two, between the necessity for the boarding boat for the harbor of San Francisco, and the necessity for this revenue cutteron the lakes, I think there is no comparison at all. I have on behalf of the Committee on Inter-state and Foreign Commerce reported a measure recommending a boarding boat for San Francisco Harbor, at an expenditure not to exceed $50,000; and the committee are perfectly willing to take to exceed so, our find the committee are perfectly willing to take that up in its regular order and present it to the House; and if the House thinks proper to pass that bill, let it go; but if it is tacked onto this bill, I am inclined to think it may embarrass its passage very much. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that there is no occasion to forestall the action of the committee in this matter.

Mr. LOUD. I do not think $50,000 will weigh this bill down, if this other vessel is really needed. If it is not needed, of course they will both fail.

Mr. MALLORY. They may both be needed, but I think there is far more necessity for the cutter on the lakes than there is for the boarding boat for the San Francisco Harbor.

Mr. LOUD. The cutter in San Francisco Harbor will save more money for this Government in one year than ten vessels on the Great Lakes will save in a hundred years.

Mr. MALLORY. I shall not dispute the gentleman on that, but I think there is a sentiment expressed in this House which shows a disposition to economize to an alarming degree—

Mr. LOUD. Let us begin with the lakes.
Mr. MALLORY. And although there can be nothing said against the passage of the bill authorizing the construction of a against the passage of the on authorizing the construction of a cutter for the lakes, I think it is possible to say a good deal against the passage of a bill providing a boarding boat for San Francisco. I do not question the propriety of building such a boat. I have made a favorable report from the committee upon it myself; but it seems to me that it ought to stand upon its own

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Has there been a bill reported for it

mr. Hold the committee?

Mr. MALLORY. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Then why should it be incorporated on this bill, if there has been a bill favorably reported from the committee and on the Calendar?

Mr. MALLORY. I do not see any reason why there should be, and for that reason I am opposed to the substitute.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I desire toask the gentleman a question. Mr. OUTHWAITE. I desire to ask the gentlemana question. Is it not a fact, and did you not make a statement to that effect, that this revenue cutter on the Great Lakes is in such a condition as to endanger the lives of the persons employed on it every time it goes out in stormy weather?

Mr. MALLORY. That was the testimony given before our committee the last Congress.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman—
Mr. SOMERS. Mr. Chairman—
Mr. MALLORY. Iyield three minutes to the gentleman from Texas.

Texas.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I sak the committee to reject the substitute. I am perfectly willing that the original bill shall go through as amended, but I do not think that Congress will be warranted at this time in undertaking the construction of three new vessels for the Revenue-Cutter Service. I am willing to authorize the construction of a cutter to be used on the New England coast and also for one on the Great Lakes.

are absolutely needed; but should we provide for a third vessel, it does seem to me that the committee will be going too far.

Mr. CAMINETTI. There is just as much necessity for this vessel in San Francisco Harbor as there is for the other two. In San Francisco we collect from $10,000,000 to $13,000,000 a year in the custom-house, and this boat is absolutely required there.

The reasons for it are identically the same as those offered for that on the Great Lakes. The great age of the boat makes it The great age of the boat makes it necessary to have a new one.

Mr. SAYERS. How old is the boat?

Mr. CAMINETTI. Eighteen years old— Mr. SAYERS. That is not the ordinary life of a boat. Mr. CAMINETTI. And it has been declared unfit for use by

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman says that this boat is only 18 years of age.

Mr. CAMINETTI. And the boat never was intended for this service. It was a second-hand tugboat originally, and was not built for this purpose.

Mr. SAYERS. Suppose it was, we have now vessels in the Navy that are over 40 years of age, and they are still doing ocean

Mr.CAMINETTI. I have investigated this matter, and am told by the officers of the boat that it is not fit to do the Government work

Mr. SAYERS. Where is the statement of the officers. Have they made any such statement to the House? Mr. CAMINETTI. Yes, sir, Mr. SAYERS. Where is it?

Mr. CAMINETTI. Oftentimes when schooners and vessels come into the harbor and the officers on this boat order them to stop, they can get away from this boarding boat, because it can not catch an ordinary sail boat; and there is a lot of smuggling going on in San Francisco Harbor.

Mr. SAYERS. If gentlemen will not assist in reducing appropriations they may just expect a "billion-dollar Congress."

Mr. CAMINETTI. I will joint he gentleman in reducing appropriations, but not at the expense of California all the time. It

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SOMERS. Mr. Chairman, in response to the inquiry of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] in regard to whether this boat on the Great Lakes, the Andy Johnson, is seaworthy or not, I wish to make a statement. The city of Milwaukee at the present time is constructing a tunnel under Lake Michigan, and present time is constructing a tunnel under Lake Michigan, and the city is building a crib out one-half mile—

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman is speaking of another vessel. Mr. SOMERS. I am speaking about the Andy Johnson, which is to be superseded by the new vessel on the Great Lakes. A storm came up while fourteen men were on this crib. This vessel, the Andy Johnson, which has been pronounced unseaworthy, was lying in Milwaukee Harbor and the officers were requested to go out to the relief of these fourteen men. They could not go out all the way to their relief, and thirteen lives were lost.

The vessel did attempt to go out, but it was so unmanageable.

The vessel did attempt to go out, but it was so unmanageable it could not approach near to the crib. It was generally conceded at the time that the vessel was unseaworthy. These thirteen men remained on that crib for hours in the storm and finally perished in full view of their friends and relatives upon the shore. If that vessel had been seaworthy and in good con-dition not one life would have been lost. I think this instance answers the question of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman is now referring to the vessel on the lakes. I referred to the vessel at San Francisco.

Mr. SOMERS. I am referring to the one in use on the lakes. And I will suggest that this boat, if constructed, will protect And I will suggest that this boat, it country upon the more coast than the whole seacoast of this country upon the West. It will protect Minnesota, it will protect Wisconsin, it will protect Illinois, it will protect Michigan, it will protect Indiana, it will protect Ohio, it will protect New York, it will protect Pennsylvania, and it is an absolute necessity. I introduced teet Pennsylvania, and it is an absolute necessity. I introduced this bill only at the instance and request of the Trensury Department

Mr. MALLORY. If there is nothing else to be said, Mr. Chairman, I will move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

Mr. LOUD. One moment. This bill, which I have offered as a substitute, was introduced by my colleague, Judge MAGUIRE, of San Francisco. I am not more specially interested in it than he is. He requests that it be withdrawn, and therefore, in compliance with that suggestion, I withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment recommended by the committee, which will be read.

The amendment was read, as follows:

After the word "lakes," in line 5, strike out "and for said purpose the sum of $175,090 be and the same is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated," and insert, "provided that the cost of said construction shall not exceed the sum of $175,090,"

Mr. MALLORY. I move that the committee rise and report the bill as amended to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and, the Speaker having resumed the chair

Mr. DOCKERY, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration a bill (H. R. 3297) providing for the construction of a steam revenue cutter for service on the Great Lakes, and had directed him to report the same to the House with the recommendation that it do pass with an amend-was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MALLORY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will call the committees to call up bills for consideration in what is known as the second morning hour.

PUBLIC FOREST RESERVATIONS.

Mr. McRAE (when the Committee on Public Lands was called). Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 119) to protect public forest reservations, which has already been partially considered

The bill was read.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, has not this bill been considered in two morning hours under this rule?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know. Is this a bill that has been up before?

Mr. MCRAE. Yes, sir; I so stated.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Then it is not in order to call it

Mr. MCRAE. I submit that it is in order.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. My understanding of the rule is that after the expiration of the second of these morning hours in which a bill has been considered it goes on the Calendar as unanished business, and does not come up again in this hour.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks there may be some doubt about that question. The language of the rule is not, perhaps, exactly clear, but the Chair thinks from an examination of it that the intent and purpose of the rule was that where a bill was called up in this morning hour and not disposed of it should retain the place upon the Calendar which it had before it was called up. The language of the rule is "of unfinished business," but there is no such calendar as a calendar of unfinished business.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Does it not lose its privilege of

The SPEAKER. Why?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Because of the language of the rule. It seems to me that the intent, the spirit of the rule is that this morning hour is to be devoted to privileged matters, and that if a bill is not concluded in the second of these morning hours, then it goes over as unfinished business, and will not thereafter encumber the Calendar of the House for the morning hour, but that after the expiration of that hour the committee will have a right to call it up when it is in order, under the rules, for that committee to have a hearing.

The SPEAKER. So far as that is concerned why can not the committee call up in the second morning hour a bill that is on the Calendar of unfinished business? There is no limitation in the rules to prevent that.

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire to suggest to the gentleman from Illinois and to the Chair that under such a construction as that one bill might be kept in this morning hour during a whole ses-

The SPEAKER. How so?

Mr. DINGLEY. Every time that the committee was called it might call up that bill. I think the construction of the rule heretofore has been that, after a committee had called up a partic-neretoure has been that, after a committee had called up a particular bill and had occupied two morning hours in its consideration, that bill passed out of the number of those that might be considered during the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has been trying to find some such ruling, but has been unable to find it.

Mr. DINGLEY. I refer to the practice. I have had bills myself go through the two hours, and I never supposed that they could be called up again in the morning hour. It seems to me that the object of the rule was to give matters of comparatively that the object of the rule was to give matters of comparatively small importance a chance to be considered in two of these morn-ing hours, but if they are to have longer than the two hours then, under that construction, they may be made to block every other business coming from the committee which calls them up.

The SPEAKER. That would operate as a restraint on the committee to prevent them from calling up such a bill again. If they had other business which they desired to have considered, naturally they would say, "We will not call up that bill again because it will lose us our hour."

Mr. DINGLEY. But it seems to me that the practical effect would be to block all other business from that committee, so that the object of the adoption of the rule would be entirely defeated. It think the object of adopting that rule was to give an entire the chief of adopting that rule was to give an entire the chief. I think the object of adoption of the rule would be entirely defeated. I think the object of adopting that rule was to give an opportunity for getting matters of comparatively slight importance through during this morning hour. And if a matter of such importance was brought up that the House could not complete it during the two hours, it passed out of the business to be considered in the morning hour and took its place to be called up as and in the property unfinished business of the House. I had always are I had always supordinary unfinished business of the House. posed that to be the construction of the rule. I have never known an instance of a bill remaining in the morning hour after it had occupied its two hours.

The SPEAKER. It can only be continued in the morning hour by the action of the committee.

Mr. DINGLEY. I am aware of that. But in that case if the bill first presented were something that the majority of the committee was especially anxious to keep before the House, they might do so and block business in which other members were intensity.

The SPEAKER. If the majority of the committee wish to pursue that course, the Chair does not see how it could be ob-

Mr. DINGLEY. I merely call attention to the fact that it has never been done heretofore.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman says "it has never been done heretofore." That, the Chair submits, has nothing to do with the question of the right to pursue that course. If there is any decision anywhere that this right does not exist, the Chair would be glad to know it. He has had the matter looked into by the Clerk and can not find any such decision. The only effect, if it were a matter stoutly resisted, if there were a number of gentlemen opposed to it, would be that that committee would lose the hour. That would be the practical effect of it.

Mr. SPRINGER. I would like to say a word on the point of order, if it has not been decided. I wish to call the attention of the Chair to a clause in paragraph 4 of Rule XXIV:

When any proposition shall have occupied two hours on this call it shall then remain on the Calendar as unfinished business and be taken up in its order.

That is to say, it shall be taken up in its order on the Calendar to which it belongs. If it belongs on the House Calendar, it will be considered when we proceed to business on the House Calendar; if on the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole, it will be taken up when we consider business in the Committee of the Whole House.

According to my recollection it has been the practice of the House ever since I have been a member, that when a bill of this kind has occupied the morning hour for two hours it then goes as unfinished business to the Calendar to which it belongs, and is to be considered when we proceed to business on that Calendar. I have no recollection of any case where a bill on this call has occupied the morning hour longer than two successive days.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me from the reading of the rule that the position taken by my colleague [Mr. SPRINGER] is absolutely correct. The object of this rule is to give the committees during the morning hour certain privileges on certain bills which they desire to call up; but upon the expiration of the second morning hour a bill which has been under consideration two hours ceases to be under the control of the committee, and becomes the property of the House; it goes to the appropriate Calendar, and can not be called up until the Calendar to which it belongs is reached in regular order.

Mr. SPRINGER. It would then be in order as the first business on the Calendar.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Yes; it would then be in order as the first business, if it happened to be the first bill on the Calendar; it would not come up under the rule in regard to the morning hour, but would be considered as the first business when the House proceeded to the consideration of that Calendar. As has been stated by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] and my colleague [Mr. SPRINGER], it has been the universal custom when a bill has received consideration in the morning hour for two hours, that it ceases from that time to have the privilege which belonged to the morning and against the consideration and the state of the consideration in the morning hour for two hours, that it ceases from that time to have the privilege which belonged to the morning hour against the consideration and the consideration in the morning hour for two hours, that it ceases from that time to have the privilege which he morning hour for the consideration of the consideration of the consideration of the calendar. As has been stated by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] and my colleague [Mr. SPRINGER], it has been the universal custom when a bill has received consideration in the morning hour for two hours, that it ceases from that time to have the privilege which has been the universal custom when a bill has received consideration in the morning hour for two hours, that it ceases from the consideration in the morning hour for two hours, that it ceases from the consideration in the morning hour for two hours, the consideration in the morning hour for two hours, the consideration in the morning hour for two hours, the consideration in the morning hour for two hours, the consideration in the morning hours for the consideration in the morning hours for the consideration in the morning hours for two hours, the consideration in the morning hours for the consideration in th which belonged to it under this rule, and goes to the Calendar as unfinished busine

The SPEAKER. Where does the gentleman find the rule which sustains him in that position? That is the question. The gentleman speaks of what has been the practice; but the Chair would like to know under what rule that practice has proceeded.

Mr. DALZELL. I would like to call the attention of the Chair to an incident which may help to onlighten this subject.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will very gladly hear the gen-

Mr. DALZELL. In the Fiftieth Congress the Committee on Mr. DALLELL. In the Fritteth Congress the Committee on the Pacific Railroads occupied two successive morning hours in the discussion of what was known as the Outhwaite bill. That was the only bill the committee had to present for consideration. But although the committee was subsequently called a number of times, Speaker Carlisle privately advised the chairman of the committee [Mr. OUTHWAITE]—there was no public ruling made on the subject—that he was not entitled to have that bill conon the subject that he was not shitted with that of the sidered again in the morning hour. I believe I am correct in my recollection that the rule in the Fiftieth Congress was in exactly the same terms as the rule under which we are now operating. The point was never made in the House and there was no public ruling; yet, as I understand—and I think the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] will bear me out in the statement—that was the position taken by Speaker Carlisle.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. The point was never made in the House and there was

DALZELL] is correct in his statement of the position taken at that time by the Speaker as to my right to bring up that bill again. The Speaker informed me that under the rule the bill went to the Calendar as unfinished business, and could only be

Mr. DALZELL, Let me say in addition, Mr. Speaker, that that was a case of peculiar hardship, for the reason that it was the only bill the committee had; and such a ruling as the Speaker seems inclined to make now would have been certainly permissible in that case if permissible at all.

The SPEAKER. The Chair had not heard of the ruling to which the gentleman refers.

The only object the Speaker has in such cases is to make such construction of the rule as to carry out what he understands to be its scope and purpose. Until now it never occurred to the Chair that by reason of having called up a bill in the morning hour you gained thereby for such measure any priority. The suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] as to the judgment of the Speaker in the Fiftieth Congress would give to a bill of this character a status on the Calendar of unfinished business. The present occupant of the Chair never thought that the rule was designed to do that.

Of course, if that is the effect of the rule, the calling up of a bill, even if it be not passed in the morning hour, gives it a superior status. Because under the rules of the House at any time after the second morning hour it is in order to proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business. So that, the Chair repeats, the calling up of a bill under this rule and the consideration. eration for two hours gives it priority of right to consideration, which the present occupant of the Chair did not suppose was the intent of the rule. The Chair was rather inclined to the opinion that when a bill was so called up, and failed to be disposed of in the two hours, it remained in all respects just as before it was

Mr. McMILLIN. And I think they have always been treated that way

The SPEAKER (continuing). Not thereby obtaining any priority over other measures as the unfinished business.

Mr. McMILLIN. If the Chair will pardon me for a moment,

I think the Chair is right.

I am inclined to think, also, that the tendency of opinion in the Speakers of the House has been toward limiting the rights on a bill to two hours. If there has been no ruling upon the subject, but following the tendency of presiding officers of the House, there has been a general sentiment against taking them up the third time. Then I think, Mr. Speaker, that even if there were no rulings on the subject, if there had been no indication by any presiding officer of his opinion on the question, the very nature of the rule would indicate that it should take this

Now, what is the object of this proceeding in the morning hour? Why was the rule in question established? It was for the purpose of allowing the consideration of many measures to which there would be no serious opposition, which could be disposed of within the half hour or the hour or the two hours which the rule gave. It was believed by the adoption of such a rule that many meritorious bills could be disposed of where there was no serious opposition to them in that manner, and thereby relieve the Calendars, which were crowded with more important ures of local importance could receive consideration.

In order to show that that was the intention of the House, the rule provided also that only two hours should pertain to any one measure, and after that it has been the rule, as indicated by the Chair, that such measures take their place on the Calendar, to be reached in the way and at the time they would have been

Mr. DOCKERY. That is correct.
Mr. McMILLIN. Now, that being the Now, that being the object, the purpose of the rule would be defeated if we can bring in a strongly contested measure on which there is a great difference of opinion, which will require hours or even days to consider, after having devoted two hours to it under the rule, and recur to it, bringing it in again and again and again, and defeat the other noncon-tested matters which it was the object of the rule to reach. If it had been the object of the rule to give more than two hours to one measure, it could have been provided. The consideration would not in that case have been limited to two hours.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the proper ruling would be, first, that the bill, if undisposed of, goes back to its original place on the Calendar where it belongs; secondly, that it is not subject to be called up again, because it has proven itself to be not one of the noncontested matters that it was the intention of the rule to get rid of in a short time; and, thirdly, that it has no advantage of Calendar or place, because it has once been considered. Of the correctness of this I have no doubt.

Mr. DINGLEY. If the Chair will pardon me I will suggest, as this matter is so important, it seems to me, with reference to the conduct of the business of the House, that the Chair with-hold his decision until he may consider the matter more at

The SPEAKER. The Chair is perfectly willing to do so.
The only object of course is to make the proper ruling.
Mr. McRAE. I see no necessity for this course, but I have no objection, with the understanding that the committee is not that we stay on the day the decito lose the hour for to-day—that we start on the day the decision is made as if the bill was first called on that day.

sion is made as if the bill was first called on that day.

Mr. DINGLEY. Of course you will not lose your hour.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, before the matter goes over I want to say a word. It will be observed that those who have objected to this bill being called again are members of committees that have the privilege of reporting at any time. They have shown no precedent for the arbitrary, unreasonable content of the arbitrary unreasonable content to the arbitrary unreasonable content struction they contend for. Follow their argument to its legitimate conclusion and you deny a large majority of the committees of this House the poor privilege of having their business considered during the morning hour unless something new is furnished on every call. This is the hour for committee business, and nothing not authorized by the committees can be brought up. The rule declares that each committee on the state of the right to call up any bill reported by it on a pre-The rule declares that each committee on being called

This bill was reported by the committee on a previous day, and I have been authorized to call it up for consideration. It is the only bill now on the Calendar reported from the Committee on Public Lands. To deny it consideration is to defeat what appears to me to be the plain provision of the rule. The rule provides that, "When any proposition shall have occupied two hours on this call it shall thereafter remain on the Calendar as un-To my mind it finished business and be taken up in its order." is perfectly clear that the two-hours limitation applies to each call and does not prevent the proposition from being called up again if the committee should be reached on another call by the Speaker. Mark the words "this call," and the words "be taken up in its order."

As the Speaker has correctly stated, the question of whether one bill shall be called more than once is for the committee in charge to determine, and the responsibility of making the call is with the committee. If the contention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Dalzell] that this bill is hereafter to be considered as unfinished business is correct, then I have no objection to withdrawing the bill, for then it could be reached as unfinished business, but I do object to a construction of the rules which will prevent consideration in the morning hour when the committee is called and not allow it to be treated as unfinished business. There is no reason or fairness in such a construction. business.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will then withhold the decision for the present. Mr. McRAE.

That is satisfactory to me. The SPEAKER. Without objection, then, the morning hour for to-day will be considered as pending, unless some other committee desires the floor.

UNIFORM SYSTEM OF BANKRUPTCY.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the special order. The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved. That on Monday next, the 23d instant, immediately after the second morning hour, the House shall proceed to the consideration of H. R. 139, "A bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," and the consideration thereof shall be continued after the second morning hour each legislative day thereafter until said bill shall have been fully disposed of; said bill to be first considered in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The order provides for the consideration of this bill in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, I was not present when the order was made, and it seems to me it is far preferable to consider the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole; but that question was adjudged and passed upon by the House. The reason why I say that is not for the purpose of getting any advantage by which I can move the previous question to cut off anybody from offering any legitimate amendment, or for the purpose of preventing necessary debate; but it might be necessary to somewhat facilitate the proceedings. My purpose, so far as I am able to show it, is to be very liberal, to allow all gentlemen an opporof offering amendments and expressing their views upon the bill, or any paragraph thereof. I ask unanimous consent that the order be changed so that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentlem in from Alabama [Mr. OATES] asks unanimous consent to alter the order made respecting the consideration of this bill, so that it may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, instead of in the Committee of the Whole itself. Is there objection?

Mr. CULBERSON. I feel constrained to object to that.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

I move that the House resolve itself into the Mr. OATES. Committee of the Whole for the consideration of this bill.

The motion was agreed to. The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 139) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, with Mr. OUTHWAITE in the

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read the first section of the bill.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentle-man from Alabama [Mr. OATES] that inasmuch as this bill is to be read by sections in the Committee of the Whole at a later stage, we might waive the reading of it now and let the debate proceed. I will state in addition to that that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE, desires to leave the city this evening for his home, and would like to address the House before he leaves. By waiving the reading of the bill now we might accommodate him, perhaps, as well as the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas Mr. CULBER-

SON] asks unanimous consent to waive the first reading of the ill. Is there objection.

Mr. OATES. If no one wishes to hear it read, I have no objection

Mr. CULBERSON. It will be read in Committee of the Whole anyway, later. The CHAIRMAN.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and the first reading of the bill will be dispensed with.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Chairman, the first question which confronts us is whether there shall be any act of bankruptcy passed. Touching that question, the consideration to which the attention of gentlemen is invited, is as to the condition of the countries. tion of gentlemen is invited, is as to the condition of the country. It seems to me that if ever there was a time—unless it be just after the close of a war which has put everything financially out of joint—which required or rendered necessary a bankruptcy law, that this is that time. We have had so much financial trouble of recent years that the statistics show an increased number of failures in business of all kinds. I think every consideration that we can fairly indulge goes to show the necessity for the enactment of a bankruptcy law, provided that law is one of perfect fairness to all parties. In order that it might be such, I, with my associates upon the Committee on the Judiciary, labored in the last Congress, and I may say in the Congress prebored in the last Congress, and I may say in the Congress pre-ceding, upon the bill which constitutes the basis of the present one, which bill was known as the Torrey bill.

In the Fifty-first Congress the bill was reported to the House in a shape in which I could not support it. I stated briefly then my objections to it. These objections were several, the principal of which was that it created additional officers and provided for the payment of their salaries out of the Treasury. Another objection was that the clauses with reference to involuntary bankruptcy were too stringent.

The bill then passed the House, but it failed to pass the Senate. During the last Congress the Committee on the Judiciary very carefully considered this bill, first by the subcommittee of which I was a member; and I think we spent our spare forenoons for two months in the consideration of it and in the examination of authorities touching every proposition concerned, where there was any room for doubt.

number of amendments, taking out of the bill all of its most drastic features, and coming as nearly as possible to making it what we deemed a fit measure to remain permanently upon our statute books if enacted into law. Then the full committee considered the bill for three months. They adopted most of the amendments recommended by the subcommittee, origin ted other amendments to the bill which were adopted, and finally agreed amendments to the bill which were adopted, and limity agreed upon a complete change so as to embody in chapters, in the most convenient form, the subjects relative to the principal thing in that chapter, somewhat in the order in which commentaries upon different branches of the law are written. That was done, and the whole ground covered by the substitute reported to the House.

The Committee on the Judiciary was not unanimously in favor of the bill. A minority presented minority views; and I must say that those views were very ably written, and some of the criticisms upon the bill, upon due consideration, I deem to be I, in consultation with other friends of the measure, prepared amendments so as to completely meet four of the objections set forth by the minority of the committee. Two other amendments were also originated, to make the bill more perfect, and put in the present bill, which I had the honor to introduce at the beginning of this session, and embodies the amendment which I intended to offer if the bill had been considered by the last House. So that, as it now stands, at least four of the most pointed objections made by the minority are cared by provisions now in the bill.

believe I can say most conscientiously that, as a general proposition, I have always been opposed to bankruptcy legislation; but on careful examination, within the last two or three years, I have so far modified my former opinion as to believe that a law properly, carefully considered, for the preservation of the rights of parties interested and to prevent the squandering of estate. frauds, and such unconscionable fee-gathering as we learn was practiced under the old law, I am now in favor of bankruptcy leg-

I was a lawyer in full practice when the law of 1867 was administered. I was of coursel on different sides of causes in the court presided over by Judge Dick Busteed, of New York, and those whom he saw-proper to appoint. So I had a fair opportunity of seeing the wildest speculation on the assets of estates of bankrupts that ever was perpetrated in any court of the world, and I therefore know what abuses could be imposed upon parties interested under the last bankrupt law. I say that I would not vote for such an act as that under any circumstances. Being aware of those abuses and of the wrongs done to a great extent, I have labored most assiduously to avoid all of them in this bill, and to limit and put such restrictions upon the officers in respect to their fees and compensation, that there can not be any wrongs done without endangering themselves with imprisonment and punishment.

Now, the leading features of the bill are the causes or grounds Now, the leading features of the bill are the causes or grounds of involuntary bankruptcy and that clause of the bill. An understanding of these and the proper distinction between voluntary and involuntary bankruptcy is necessary for one to see the justice of the measure. We are all more or less in sympathy with poor debtors; much more in sympathy with them than we are with the creditor class. We have, too, something of the popular idea that if a man voluntarily goes into bankruptcy that dishonor the popular idea that if a man voluntarily goes into bankruptcy that dishonor the popular idea. hitches on to him, and that it applies to him a stigma or an odium; but such is not the fact. Some of those who have never been much accustomed to this legislation, who have never examined the foundations upon which it rests, may indulge such an opinion; but when well informed no one can think for a moment that there is any dishonor whatever, either in a man becoming a voluntary bankrupt or being forced into bankruptcy, except in

There are two grounds upon which a man could be forced into bankruptey by which odium and dishonor would attach to him. The first is utter insolvency, which of itself does not reflect dishonorably upon anyone, but only shows misfortune; secondly, if there is fraud and a man is put into bankruptcy upon that ground he would justly be considered as odious to the extent of his fraudulent act. So he would be if sued on same grounds in any court. Is it dishonorable for a poor debtor, who has lived the life of an honest man, and has simply been unfortunate in his undertakings, or who has been overburdened with the debts resting upon him to such an extent that he is unable to pay his debta, shall a man who is thus unfortunate, gotten into debt to an extent that he can not pay, be kept in that attitude all the days of his life, practically a laborer to pay interest upon the demands against him or to live on the small amount of his exemptions under the State laws? Is there not humanity enough in the whole country to be willing to enact a statute that will allow him, as country to be willing to enact a statute that will allow him, as this does, to reserve for his use all which the laws of the State or Territory give him as exempt from execution and make a surrender of whatever he may have over for the benefit of his creditors? Is there any creditor so hard hearted that he would hold that poor man down to labor for him to pay perhaps a very small portion of the debt, perhaps only the interest upon it, and thus destroy prospects? Would not every reasonable creditor be allow him to make a surrender of his property if it his future prospects? only paid 10 cents on the dollar of his indebtedness, and leave free to get out into the world and undertake to rebuild his shattered fortunes?

I can not think that anyone who will consider the question can not think that anyone who will consider the question can oppose voluntury bankruptcy. Yet there are some members upon this floor who are conscientiously opposed to the enactment of any bankruptcy law, and I wish to say to them just here that I think their position, when you come to examine it, is more consistent than the position of those who think that a bankruptcy law ought to be only for the benefit of the poor debtor, that the creditor would have no benefit from it, no voice in the matter. I say it is more consistent to oppose any bankruptcy legislation than to take that position. Before passing from that point let me remark that in advocating this bill I am simply dispoint let me remark that in advocating this out I am simply discharging a duty. I feel no personal interest in it, except in the interest of honesty, fair dealing, and general prosperity. I want to present the measure fairly, and am in favor of its passage because I believe that it will be of benefit to the people generally.

I invite the careful attention of all of you to its various, provisions, and if, having considered them, you think the bill should not pass and vote it down, I am content, having done my duty. To those who think that there should be no bankruptcy law will say, you may save a great deal of trouble, if you believe the majority of the House agree with you, by moving, at the end of the general debate, to strike out the enacting clause of this bill. In that way you can get a test vote, showing whether this House wants to enact any bankruptcy legislation, and I have no objection in the world to any gentleman making that motion. If anyone thinks there is a sufficient number of members here to carry a motion like that I shall be glad to have the question tested at that time, because in the absence of such a motion we will, of ourse, go on to consider the bill in detail.

The bill will be read by sections and paragraphs for amendment and discussion, and then when we reach the second chapter we shall reach the question whether we desire to have any involuntary bankruptcy. Upon that I do not hesitate to say that there is the greatest difference of opinion among the members of the judiciary.

There is also another difference. There may be some here who do not care for any involuntary clause at all, would really prefer not to have it in the bill. There are others who want to limit and restrict the causes of involuntary bankruptcy set forth in the bill to those which would warrant an attachment for debt. My view of that question is simply this. There is no more dishonor about a man's being sued in a court of bankruptcy than there is about being sued in any other court. The Constitution of the United States authorizes Congress to pass a bankruptcy law, and when the law is passed it is to be in the interest of honesty, morality, and humanity.

What was the object of the framers of the Constitution? It is very strongly set forth by one of the best commentators that has ever written on the Constitution of the United States. Mr.

Justice Story says:

To the glory of Christianity let it be said that the law of cession was introduced by the Christian emperors of Rome, whereby if a debtor ceded or yielded up all his property to his creditors he was secured from being dragged to jail by violence.

That distinguished jurist also says that-

The general objects of all bankrupt and insolvent laws are, on one hand, to secure to creditors an appropriation of the property of the debtor's protess to the discharge of their debts whenever the latter are unable to discharge the whole amount: and, on the other hand, to relieve unfortunate and honest debtors from perpetual bondage to their creditors, either in the shape of unlimited imprisonment to coerce payment of their debts or of an absolute right to appropriate and monopolize all their future earnings.

The latter course obviously destroys all encouragement to industry and enterprise on the part of the unfortunate debtor, by taking from him all the fust rewards of labor, and leaving him a miserable pittance dependent upon the bounty or forbearance of his creditors. The former is, if possible, more harsh, severe, and indefensible. It makes poverty and misfortune, in themselves sufficiently heavy burdens, the subject or the occasion of penalities and punishments. Imprisonment, as a civil remedy, admits of no defense except as it is used to coerce fraudulent debtors to yield up their present property to their creditors, in discharge of their engagements.

But when the debtors have no property, or have yielded up the whole to their creditors, to allow the latter at their mere pleasure to imprison them, is a refinement in cruelty, and an indulgence of private passions, which could hardly find apology in an enlightened despotism; and are utterly at war with all the rights and duties of free government. Such asystem of legislation is as unjustas it is unfeeling. It is incompatible with the first precepts of Christianity: and is a living reproach to the nations of Christendom, carrying them back to the worst ages of paganism.

One of the first duties of legislation, while it provides amply for the sacred obligation of contracts, and the remedies to enforce them, certainly is, pari passu, to relieve the unfortunate and theritorious debtor from a slavery of mind and body which cuts him off from a fair enjoyment of the common benealts of society, and robs his family of the fruits of his labor and the benefits of his paternal superintendence. A national government which did not possess this power of legislation would be little worthy of the exalted functions of guarding the happiness and supporting the rights of a free people. It might guard against political oppressions, only to render private oppressions more intolerable and more glaring.

Be it said to the praise of humanity and its progress that imprisonment for debt has been abolished in all civilized coun-

There is another distinction that I wish to draw just here between the two kinds of bankruptcy, the voluntary and the involuntary. The voluntary bankrupt's application can not be controverted. He files his petition for bankruptcy and swears to it, and he is adjudged a bankrupt and no one can controvert it. There can be no controversy about it. He alleges that he is unable to pay his debts, that he has not enough property over and above his legal exemptions to pay them. He files his petition and gets the benefit of the act. He is adjudged a bankrupt and receives the benefits of the law. A man is appointed by the creditors to take charge of what he surrenders, to administer it and pay it out upon debts of the same class pro tanto.

On the other hand the creditor is restricted to a few cases in which he may ask for his debtor to be adjudged a bankrupt. In this bill ten grounds are specified, which I will not take time to consider now. The property of the bankrupt, under the pro-visions of this bill, can not be seized. It remains in his hands consider now. unless the petitioners to put him into bankruptcy make affidavit that he is likely to dispose of it wrongfully and put it out of their reach, and give bond to answer for the property and also to answer in damages.

Therefore a proceeding to declare a man a bankrupt is in the nature of any other suit. You can not interfere with his pos-session without making this affidavit and giving this bond. He can go into the courts and defend against the alleged ground of bankruptcy. Under the provisions of the bill he has a right to ask for a jury to pass upon the grounds and the proofs submit-ted. If the allegation is that he has been guilty of a fraud, or if he has failed to pay his debts and he be utterly insolvent, as is provided for in one or two cases in the bill, or if he be not insolvent, if he has not committed any fraud upon his creditors, he has a right to appear and controvert the petition of the creditors, and unless the allegations are fully proven the same will be dismissed at their cost

The onus of proof would be upon the petitioners. The debtor has only to defend. And do you tell me that any guiltless man would be convicted, would be adjudged a bankrupt? If guiltless he would not be so adjudged; he would not be hurt by the suit any more than a man is liable to be annoyed or hurt by theing re-quired to defend any suit which may be brought against him in

Now, while humanity appeals to us in the present distressed condition of our country to pass a law which will allow poor debtors who have acted honestly to surrender what they have over and above exemptions and be finally discharged from their liabilities and allowed to embark anew in the enterprises of life— on the other hand are we to pass such a law on this subject as would leave out of sight and consideration all the creditors? Why, gentlemen, there is never in any case a debtor without a creditor, nor a creditor without a debtor; the two classes are equal. While one man may owe many debts, may be a debtor many times, he may be a creditor of many others. But debtors and creditors are equal. I think common fairness requires that if you pass any bankruptey law at all, it should be one giving fair consideration to both classes.

This bill does not require, as did the old law, that the debtor shall owe $300, or any other specified sum, before he can avail himself of the benefits of the law. Whenever he owes any sum more than he can pay he may voluntarily go into bankruptcy. But in order that a debtor may be put into bankruptcy involuntarily he must owe at least $500 to the creditors who proceed against him; and no one captious or oppressive creditor can put a debtor into bankruptcy; there must be at least three creditors cooperating, unless the total number of those to whom he is indebted be less than twelve. And the amount of the indebtedness must be at least $500. Besides, he must be guilty, as I before remarked, of some fraud which the creditors are required affirmatively to show, or he must have failed to pay his commercial paper and be insolvent, or have committed some other ground of bankruptey

I call attention to the fact that creditors on open accounts can not force the debtor into bankruptcy at all. The indebtedness must consist of liquidated demands amounting to $500 or more, otherwise the creditors can not force him into bankruptcy; they are not eligible to file a petition under this bill. If such a petition be filed it must show not only that the debtor has failed to pay his paper for thirty days after it has fallen due, but that he is also insolvent. One of the reasons why I voted against the bill in the Fifty-first Congress was that it made a failure to pay compaper for thirty days a cause of bankruptcy

This bill does not permit that unless the debtor is also insolvent. And the term "insolvent" is defined in the first section of the bill, know as "the dictionary clause." According to that definition a debtor is insolvent when he has not property enough at a fair valuation to pay his debts. The reason for that proviat a fair valuation to pay his debts. The reason for that provision is this: If a man has enough property subject to execution to pay his debts, his creditor can proceed in the courts of the State or the United States, as the case may be, to collect his money according to the regular course of law. The ground recognized by this bill for putting a debtor into bankruptcy is that he has not paid his debts when due and has not enough property when converted into cash to pay his debts in full; in such cases, he being insolvent, the object of the bill is an equitable dis-

Now, in all the contingencies contemplated by the bill the petitioners would be bound to prove the facts affirmatively; and if they do not furnish proof to the satisfaction of the judge or the jury, as the defendant may choose, he can not be forced into bankruptcy

We want a bankruptcy law for its uniformity and justice? Gentlemen know that the grounds for attachment in the different States vary; the laws of different States vary with reference to the collection of debts. This bill is intended not as a machine for the speedy collection of debts, but as an instrumentality on the one hand to relieve poor debtors from the burdens that would otherwise weigh them down; and on the other hand to furnish creditors the means of reaching the property of the debtor and making an equitable distribution among honest creditors, in cases where the debtor is a rascal and is undertaking to conceal his property so that it may escape liability for his debts, or where the debtor is in fact insolvent.

Now, let me state that there are some sections of this bill which gentlemen reading them alone may think should be amended. Gentlemen may think those provisions do not cover the case, and may be disposed to offer amendments. But let me say that if they will read the whole bill carefully, they will be troubled to find any clause requiring any amendment unless it is a departure from the principles of the bill. The objects and purposes of the bill I have endeavored to explain; and I think an examination of the measure will sustain the statements I have

Mr. KILGORE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. KILGORE. May I ask the gentleman a question?
Mr. OATES. Certainly.
Mr. KILGORE. I understand the gentleman to say that his objection to the bill which was considered in the Fifty-first Congress—or rather one of his objections—was that it did not define "insolvency;" and he states that there is such a definition in

Mr. OATES. The genteman did not catch my meaning accurately. That was one objection I had to the measure; but I stated as another objection the provision of that bill making it a ground of bankruptcy if a debtor, although solvent, failed for thirty days to meet his commercial paper.

Mr. KILGORE. Yes, I understand; that is one of the grounds of the gentleman's objection. Now, the definition of "insolvency" as given in this bill departs, as I understand, from the definition heretofore given by the courts which have put a judi-cial construction upon that term; does it not?

cial construction upon that term; does it not?

Mr. OATES. I think it is a departure, but it is more favorable than that given by the courts. The bill says "insolvent" as applied to a person shall mean that his property is not sufficient in amount, at a fair valuation, to pay his debts.

Mr. KILGORE. Well, the definition you give of a bankrupt is a man who is not able to pay his debts, or rather whose property is not sufficient on a fair valuation to pay his debts. That is the definition given in the bill, and that, I think, is more favorable than that given by the courts heretofore. Now, the question is, who is to determine the question of the value? That is the difficulty that will arise; and I would like to hear the gentleman on that, and other features of the bill which have given me very much trouble heretofore. me very much trouble heretofore

Mr. OATES. I think, Mr. Chairman, there is no difficulty about that point. If a petition be filed to have one adjudged a bankrupt, on the ground of his insolvency and failure to pay his commercial paper for thirty days, it would bring up the question presented by my friend from Texas—and it is a legitimate in-presented by my friend from 1exas—and it is a legitimate in-quiry—on the issues raised by the defendant to hear testimony as to whether he is insolvent or not.

Mr. KILGORE. The question is, who is to appraise the property; whether the property of the insolvent, at a fair val-uation, will pay his debts? That, I understand, is the language of the bill. But who is to determine the question of the valua-tion of the property. tion of the property.

Mr. OATES. I was going on to say that it was an issue to be determined on trial by the court or the jury. It is a matter of fact which they will determine. Insolvency must be alleged and proven before the defendant could be adjudged a bankrupt. The jury would be naturally inclined to be liberal with the defendant. They nearly always are in such cases.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Let me ask my colleague a question; Why do you put a man in bankruptcy simply because he is insolvent? On what principle?

lvent? On what principle?

Mr. OATES. There is no ground in the bill which will subject any one to be put into bankruptcy on the ground of insolvency alone.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. There must be fraud connected with

Mr. OATES. There must be fraud connected with it or a failure to pay his commercial paper within the time specified, or allowing his property to be levied on and not releasing it after a given time. For in that case it is readily seen if the property is seized and sold to be applied to the payment of the debt of the plaintiff in execution, it may deprive equally meritorious claimants of their right to participate in the distribution of the prop

Mr. COBB of Alabama. The purpose, as I understand it, is where a man's property is insufficient to pay his debts, to prevent one creditor from getting an undue advantage of the others. That, I understand, is the reason you frame and advocate this

That, I understand, is the reason you frame and advocate this bill.

Mr. OATES. The following are the grounds of involuntary bankruptcy as set forth in the bill:

SEC. 2. a Acts of bankruptcy.—Acts of bankruptcy by a person shall consist of his having within six months prior to the filing of a petition against him (1) concealed himself, departed or remained away from his place of business, residence, or domicile with intent to avoid the service of civil process and to defeat his creditors; (2) falled for thirty days while insolvent to secure the release of any property levied upon under process of law for $500 or over, or (if such property is to be sold under such process then until three days before the time fixed for such sale and until a petition is filed); (3) made a transfer of any of his property with intent to defeat his creditors; (4) made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors or filed in court a written statement admitting his inability to pay his debts; (5) made while insolvent a contract personally, or by agent, for the purchase or sale of a commodity with linent not to receive or deliver the same, but merely to receive or pay a difference between the contract and the market price thereof, at a time subsequent to the making of such contract; (6) made while insolvent a transfer of any of his property or suffered any of it to be taken or levied upon by process of law or otherwise for the purpose of giving a preference; (7) procured or suffered a judgment to be entered against himself with intent to defeat his creditors; (8) secreted any of his property to avoid its being levied upon under legal process against himself and to defeat his creditors; (8) secreted any of his property to avoid its being levied upon under legal process against himself and to defeat his creditors; (9) suffered while insolvent an execution for $500 or over, or a number of executions saggregating such amount shown to be due by such executions shall be paid before a petition is filed; or (10) suspended and not resumed fo

Mr. OATES. Insolvency is one reason. But the ground of bankruptcy is a failure to pay commercial paper, or the fraudulent conveyance of his property, and the other grounds specified in the bill to which I have just referred. Suppose, for instance, the debtor is a trader and fails for thirty days to pay his commercial paper

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Do you limit it to traders?

Mr. OATES. No; it does not, as I will presently explain; but he must be shown to be insolvent.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Now, the point is, in the thirty-day matter, failure to pay his commercial paper for thirty days, is that limited to traders or does it extend to every one?

Mr. OATES. No; because farmers and laborers are not subject to be adjudged involuntary bankrupts in any case, but may woluntarily obtain the benefit of the law upon their own petition.

Mr. GOLDZIER. Except by their voluntary petition.

Mr. OATES. I am speaking of those who are subject to be adjudged involuntary bankrupts. Of course, by their own petition they can be made bankrupts, and it is open for them, as for everybody else, by voluntary action, except corporations. I will state here the reasons for making these exceptions. From my investigation of bankruptcy legislation in the past, and the causes of it, it originally applied to traders, merchants, and others engaged in commercial business. It never was intended to be extended to the tillers of the soil and the common laborers of the country. And while this bill extends to them the benefit of going into bankruptcy, when not able to pay their debts, are they to be compelled or forced into bankruptcy. in no case are they to be compelled or forced into bar So you will see— Mr. COBB of Alabama. That is the point to which-

Mr. OATES (continuing). So you will see the involuntary clauses will be applicable in all cases only of traders, merchants,

Mr. COBB of Alabama. The point was just there, whether or not the involuntary feature of your bill is limited to traders as the original bankruptcy idea was limited?

Mr. OATES. Not in words.

Mr. BAILEY. If the gentleman will permit me to make a suggestion.

Mr. OATES. Certainly. Mr. BAILEY. In reply to the gentleman's colleague from Alabama he states that under the provisions of this bill there must be misconduct coupled with insolvency

Now, under the fourth ground for involuntary bankruptcy as provided in the bill, provision is made that anyone who has made an assignment, or filed in court a written statement show-ing instility to pay his debts, may be adjudged a bankrupt, the language being, "made an assignment for the benefit of his language being, "made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors, or filed in court a written statement admitting his inability to pay his debts." Either the one or the other, whether he is solvent or insolvent, and without reference to any miscon-

Mr. OATES. I can easily answer that. Every lawyer who has examined the question knows that whenever Congress exercises the power and enacts a bankruptcy law, State insolvency laws are sur spended.

Mr. BAILEY. That is, if they conflict—
Mr. OATES. Ah, but they are suspended—
Mr. BAILEY. Wherever they conflict, but where they do not conflict they are not suspended.

Mr. OATES. You will not deny that they conflict in the administration of the assets of the estate?

Mr. BAILEY. They will conflict if you insert this provision, but with that omitted there need be no conflict.

Mr. OATES. There are more reasons than that. Wherever a debtor has made an assignment or filed in court his declaration of his inability to pay his debts, with a schedule of his assets, for the benefit of his creditors, inasmuch as the bankruptcy law operates to suspend State insolvency laws, wherever there may be a conflict-limit it to that-you are sure to find a conflict in the course of the administration of the estate, and can not avoid it. Wherever that occurs, I doubt whether any great benefits could be derived from such an assignment as far as the debtor is concerned, for he has made an assignment and surrendered his property, and is no longer interested in it. He has no interest in it at all. He has surrendered it already. Then how can you better administer it than by dividing it up equitably according to the claims of the creditors, under a general bankruptcy law.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Right there I want to ask for information. Where you have a State law which equitably divides the assets of the debtor in case of insolvency, why should you take the administration of a case of that sort from the State authorities and give it to the authority of the Government of the United States.

United States:

Mr. OATES. For two reasons: The first is that the State law is suspended-

Mr. COBB of Alabama. It may be suspended where there is

Mr. OATES. Whether there be any conflict or not, the bankruptcy law is much more acceptable to the debtor because it discharges him from his debts, whereas the State insolvency law will not reach a nonresident creditor.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Then he would seek the benefit of the bankruptcy law voluntarily, would he not, if he wanted it?
Mr. OATES. He might. If he seeks it voluntarily, then the provision referred to by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] has no operation whatever in this controversy.

Mr. BOATNER. If the gentleman will permit me to make a suggestion right there, if the debtor has made an assignment of is property, as has been suggested, he has no interest in it.

Mr OATES. None at all.

Mr. BOATNER. The creditors are the ones that are inter-

Mr. OATES. Certainly. Mr. BOATNER. And therefore they are the ones who should have the right to name the man who is to settle the estate.

Mr. OATES. Certainly, and under this act the creditors have the right to name that man.

Mr. BAILEY. Suppose an insolvent debtor in a State of this Union, the laws of which provide that wherever the estate pays a certain percentage of the indebtedness the assignor shall stand discharged—suppose I reside in a State having such a law. My creditors all reside there. I make an assignment according to the laws of my State. I assign sufficient property to discharge me under the State insolvency law, and yet, under the provisions of this bill, I could be dragged into a bankruptcy court and made a bankrupt against my will, and my estate might be wasted.

Mr. OATES. Wasted! What right have you to assert that?

Mr. KILGORE. That has been the history of such proceedings in the past. Mr. BAILEY. Mr. BAILEY. The suggestion is made that a State insolvency law can not release a man from his debts. It can release him from his debts to citizens of that State.

Mr. OATES. Those who come in and prove up their claims and share in the distribution of his estate

That would depend upon the provisions of the Mr. BAILEY.

Mr. OATES. I will state to my friend that the knowledge of the fact that the States could not deal with the discharge of in-debtedness to creditors residing outside of the State, and that the debtor could not be discharged from debts owing to creditors in other States was one of the considerations which induced the framers of the Constitution to put this power in Congress. No State insolvent law can discharge the debt of a creditor who does not prove his claim nor share in the estate,

Mr. BAILEY. Precisely so as to foreign creditors, but as to creditors who reside within a State, the State can discharge the debtor from every debt contracted after the enactment of the insolvency law.

Mr. OATES. Yes; but as to those contracted before, it can

Mr. BOATNER. But as a matter of fact, are not the State insolvency laws practically a dead letter, because the condition which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] describes hardly ever exists; the fact being that a condition of things where the debtor and all his creditors reside in the same jurisdiction, is the rare exception. The debtor may make a surrender of his property under the insolvency law of his State, and he may be discharged so far as the creditors residing in his State are concerned, but he is still burdened with the debts owing to those creditors but he is still burdened with the debts owing to those creditors who do not reside within the jurisdiction.

Mr. BAILEY. Then he could voluntarily take advantage of the bankruptcy law, could he not?

Mr. OATES. I will call the gentleman's attention to the fact that such a law as this secures uniformity in administration, and the assumption that the property would be wasted is rather an anticipation. This bill, if it becomes a law, will not allow any such thing as that to occur. I also say that this bill, if a law can be more economically fairly, and expeditiously administration. law, can be more economically, fairly, and expeditiously administered than any State insolvency law.

Mr. KILGORE. Now, Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. OATES. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Chair-

Mr. KILGORE. I do not want to trespass upon the time of the gentleman. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama has twenty minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. OATES. I will answer the question of the gentleman from Texas, but I would suggest to my friend that the intent and purpose of the various clauses of this bill will be discussed n it is considered under the five-minute rule. Mr. KILGORE. I will want to talk a little about them my-self when we come to that. I am discussing that proposition which provides that three creditors, if a debtor has more than which provides that three creditors, if a debtor has more than twelve, can put him into bankruptcy, and that one, if he has less than twelve (that is eleven), controlling $500 of indebtedness, can put him into bankruptcy. Now, that is the most obnoxious feature, to my mind. I will ask the gentleman from Alabama if, on page 50, beginning at line 3, that portion of the bill does not provide that one man can put a debtor into bankruptcy, even if he has a dozen creditors? Now, the law says

Mr. OATES. No, sir. Mr. KILGORE. Now, I will read it, and let us see:

If it be averred in the petition that the creditors of the bankrupt are less than twelve in number, and less than three creditors have joined as petitioners therein, and the answer avers the existence of a larger number of creditors, there shall be filed with the answer a list under oath of all the creditors, with their addresses and the several amounts due to them, and thereupon the court shall cause all such creditors to be notified of the pendency of such petition and shall delay the hearing upon such petition for a reasonable time, to the end that parties in interest shall have an opportunity to be heard.

Now, if it is disclosed that there are more than twelve creditors the petition is not dismissed.

Mr. OATES. The petition would have to be dismissed if there were more than a dozen creditors.

Mr. KILGORE. That does not say so.

Mr. OATES. It says expressly, if there be less than twelve it must be dismissed.

Mr. KILGORE. The answer must develop in the contest the fact that there are more creditors than twelve by him setting out a list of the creditors. Then it says that all the creditors shall be notified, and they shall come in and have a hearing.

Mr. OATES. But it does not follow that he will be adjudged a bankrupt; on the contrary, the court proceeds only by virtue of the statute.

Mr. KILGORE. It does not authorize the dismissal of the petition, but, on the contrary, authorizes a hearing.

Mr. OATES. Why, everything that may be averred in the petition may be heard, and if the petition does not conform to the requirements of the statute in every respect it must be dismissed; and I think if my friend, as he is a lawyer, would think of it, he would see that it is that way.

Mr. KILGORE. My theory is that they are brought in here to answer

Mr. OATES. They are notified, in order to give them an op-portunity to appear if they desire to do so; but if the defendant shows there are a greater number than twelve, the party who has filed this petition has no case in court. It would be unceremoniously dismissed

Mr. BOATNER. Unless the other creditors should join in the application which has been made. OATES. That case is provided for

Mr. BOATNER. Why then this provision, in which it is provided that the other creditors shall be notified? Am I to understand that is put in the petition here so as to give them an opportunity to appear?

Mr. OATES. It is only to give them an opportunity to ap-The petitioner has averred in his petition that there are less than twelve creditors. Now, if the defendant says there are a greater number, they probably have no notice of it, and this is simply a provision to notify them. If it is proven to the court there are more than twelve, and one man has petitioned, he has no case and the petition will be dismissed unless at least two others join him in it.

Mr. BOATNER. The law does not say so.

Mr. OATES. The law does not say it will go on, and how will the court proceed in the absence of a statute authorizing it? United States court would go on and do anything of that kind without authority

Mr. BOATNER. In constructing any law you have to give it a reasonable construction. It says that where there are more than twelve creditors, that the bankrupt with the answer shall furnish a list of those creditors; and the law proceeds to say that the hearing shall be delayed for a reasonable time, until these parties can be notified.

What would be the sense of giving them a notice if it was not for the purpose of enabling them to come in and make them-selves a party to the proceedings? If you included in that sec-tion a prevision that unless more than the certain number of twelve should join in the petition it should be dismissed, why, then, it would be stopped, it would give a notice to the creditors and an opportunity to make themselves a party to the proceed-

Mr. OATES. My answer is very clear.
Mr. KILGORE. The answer is found in the act here. Discussing the same question it says:

Creditors other than original petitioners may, at any time, enter their appearance and join in the petition, or file an answer and be heard in opposition to the prayer of the petition.

Mr. KILGORE. But one man can take him into court, and if he has a thousand creditors he must disclose that fact and the number of his creditors, and when they get him into court then they can come in and join.

Mr. OATES. Ah, but it requires them to come in.

Mr. KILGORE. But if they do not, one man can take him in, to begin with.

Mr. OATES. But that is not your question, and one is not sufficient to proceed with.

Mr. KILGORE. Yes. My proposition was this, that no matter how many creditors a man had one creditor could take him into court

Mr. OATES. Your question was this, as I understood it: One petitioner may file the petition, the debtor may allege that he owes a greater number of people than twelve, and may disclose Mr. OATES the names of those to whom he is indebted, and thereupon the court must give notice to them. Then it is left to their option whether they will join in the proceeding or not. They are not compelled to join. The petitioner has alleged that there are less than twelve creditors, the defendant denies this, and it is right if they do not see proper to join, what becomes of the petition? That is the question that I was answering, and I say the petition would evidently be dismissed. for the reason that I would evidently be dismissed, for the reason that no United States court ever has jurisdiction to try any cause except by virtue of a statute, and the statute does not affirmatively give any such right where there is only one petitioner and a disclosure of the fact that there is a greater number of creditors than twelve.

Mr. KILGORE. My proposition was that although the man may have a thousand creditors, one of them can take him into court, and then when he is in court, if he has more than twelve creditors, any number of them may join in the petition.

Mr. OATES, Or they may not.

Mr. KILGORE. But one man can take him into court.

But one man can not have him adjudged a bank. rupt. He could not be proceeded against, and made a bankrupt upon the petition of one creditor when he owes twelve people or

Mr. STOCKDALE. What is the propriety of putting a provision into the law to authorize one creditor to go into court and litigate with the debtor as to whether he is a bankrupt or not? What effect would that be likely to have upon the business prospects of the creditor?

There is no adjudication unless other creditors Mr. OATES.

Mr. STOCKDALE. But he has to answer on the petition of one creditor and has to disclose his whole business.

Mr. OATES. Just as in any other suit. Did the gentleman never know of suits being brought which were ill-founded, yet in which the defendant had to answer? I have defended and beaten agreat many suits of that kind. There is no special hard-

Mr. STOCKDALE. But here is a case where the court is trying, at the instance of one man, the question whether a man is a bankrupt or not, when he may have forty creditors besides the one that has brought him into court.

Mr. OATES. But can the court try that question at the instance of one creditor?

Mr. STOCKDALE. No; but the debtor is required to come in and answer and disclose his whole business, and there is a great ado about his business, and it may injure his prospects.

Mr. OATES. I dony that there is a great ado about his business, or that any question relating to his business is to be tried. The first question, a jurisdictional fact, is: Has this one creditor a right to proceed by virtue of the debtor having less than twelve creditors? If he has more than twelve it is a clear case that the matter can not proceed unless two others join the petitioner. If they do not join, the debtor goes out of court. If they do, they have a right to go on and try whether he is a bankrupt or not.

Mr. STOCKDALE. The law of 1867 required that a majority of the creditors should join.

Mr. OATES. I am not now talking about the law of 1867. But you are mistaken about that law requiring a majority to

Mr. BOATNER. I understand the gentleman to concede the position which I took awhile ago, that the object of the law in requiring the names of other creditors to be disclosed and delaying the proceedings until they have received notice, is to permit those creditors to be made parties, either by joining in the application or by opposing it. Is that the gentleman's un-

Mr. OATES. They may join in it, or oppose it, or ignore it.
Mr. BOATNER. In case they ignored it the proceeding would be dismissed, but my contention was that the object was to permit them to be made parties either by joining in the petition, or by opposing it.

Mr. OATES. If they see proper to oppose the application it can have no standing in court because there is then only one petitioner

Mr. TERRY. I would suggest to the gentleman that the real difficulty consists in this, that the fact of one man having brought a man into court as a bankrupt will have a direct tendency to urge the other creditors on. The action of the first creditor casts a cloud over the debtor, and the other creditors will have an idea that unless they come in and join they will get less, so they will come in.

Mr. OATES. That would depend on circumstances. If they believed that he had committed acts of bankruptcy and was subject to judicial proceedings they would probably join in order to protect their interests; but if they did not so believe they would not incur the liability of paying costs or of being beaten in the litigation. If they preferred to allow him to go on and not be adjudged a bankrupt they certainly would not join.

Mr. TERRY. The gentleman from his practice as a lawyer is well aware of the fact that when one creditor has sued out a writ of attachment against a debtor, even though there may be no grounds for the proceeding, every other creditor generally is ready to come down on him.

Mr. OATES. Yes; and that is one reason why I am in favor of this bill; for it provides that when a single creditor undertakes to attach the property or assets of a debtor, other credit-ors may come in and throw the debtor into bankruptcy, thus enabling a composition to be made and allowing opportunity for extending terms to the debter—for discharging him upon equitable terms, so that he may go into business again, and that a single creditor may not be able to ruin him by taking all that

Mr. RAY. If my colleague on the committee [Mr. OATES] will allow me to call his attention to one section of this bill, I should be glad to do so.

Mr. OATES. I will yield to the gentleman; still a colloquy of his kind is beyond my purpose. When I rose to speak on this measure I intended to discuss its general principles, reserving these matters of detail for consideration when the bill shall read for amendment under the five-minute rule

But I think these objections should be removed Mr. RAY.

mr. OATES. I am willing that the gentleman shall put his

Mr. RAY. I would like to have the gentleman either remove my objection by an explanation, or give consent to an amendment which will obviate the objection. I call his attention to section 2, which defines "acts of bankruptcy:"

Acts of bankruptcy by a person shall consist of his having within six months prior to the filing of a petition agains him (1) concealed himself, departed or remained away from his place of business, residence, or domicile with intent to avoid the service of civil process and to defeat his creditors.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Although he may have returned.
Mr. RAY. That is the point I was going to call attention to.
This does not say that the debtor must be insolvent; but if he has done either of the acts named he may at any time within has done either of the acts named he may at any time within six menths thereafter be forced into bankruptcy, even though long before the creditor institutes a proceeding he may have returned to his home, submitted himself to the process of the courts, and even paid the debt or claim against him. Some creditor through anger or spite may within the time specified appeal to the courts, prove that the debtor has committed some of the acts permed and may have him adjudged a healthness. the acts named, and may have him adjudged a bankrupt. is no escape from that construction under the bill as now framed. Is not the gentleman willing to have the bill amended by prois not the gentleman withing to have the our amended by providing that if before such petition is filed the debtor has returned and submitted himself to the process of the court or paid the claim, such petition shall be dismissed?

Mr. OATES. I will answer my friend from New York [Mr. RAY], although in doing so I am overstepping the field I expected to occupy at the present time. I have no idea that there is any State of the Union that has failed to provide by its laws that going out of the jurisdiction of the court or dodging its process is a ground for attachment against the debtor; and it has been adjudicated by every supreme court before which the question has been raised that this ground continues good only while the fact exists; that if the debtor has meanwhile come back and subjected himself to the jurisdiction of the court, no attachment can be sustained on that ground. The same construction would be adhered to in the administration of this law. And if the debt were paid before a suit was brought no court would sustain it.

Mr. RAY. But, my friend—

The CHAFRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] has expired.

Mr. RAY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to conclude his remarks.

Mr. OATES. I am much obliged to the gentleman, but I will not trespass farther upon the attention of the House. I wish only to add that there has been printed as a part of this bill an analysis with a good many authorities, and I ask that this analysis extending from page 63 to 68 inclusive of the bill) be printed in the RECORD for the information of members.

Mr. STOCKDALE. As it is printed in the bill why print it in the RECORD?

If there is any objection

Mr. STOCKDALE. I do not object, but I do not see the necessity for making the request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES]? The Chair hears none. The analysis referred to by Mr. OATES is as follows:

ANALYSIS OF THE TORREY BANKRUPT BILL.

ANALYSIS OF THE TORREY BANKRUPT BILL.

SECTION 1. Meaning of words and phrases.—The use of certain words in lieu of phrases, which is made possible by this section, adds to the clearness of the bill and makes it shorter by thousands of words than it otherwise would be, e.p., "States" shall include the Territories and the District of Columbia.

SEC. 2. Acts of bankruptcy.—In general terms acts of bankruptcy are divided into those which constitute dishonesty and those which are the result of insolvency.

It was thought that if a debter was acting dishonestly with his property or if he had become insolvent, his creditors ought to have an opportunity to secure the payment of at least a percentage of their claims. In a financial sense it is immaterial to the creditor whether the debtor has acted dishonestly or become insolvent will as the probable result to him in either case, be the loss of a part of the amount due.

Very careful restrictions have been made with reference to the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy (see sec. 50, Who may file and dismiss petitions).

The passon acting these recordings are instituted will have avery one.

The person against whom proceedings are instituted will have every opportunity to make a defense as in other cases (see sec. 10, Jury trials). Any of the creditors who desire may assist in the defense of the case (see sec. 18, Process, pleadings, and adjudications).

During the pendency of the proceedings the defendant will retain possession of his property, unless the creditors can convince the court that there is danger to the taking of a litinal custody; such an order will not be executed unless the creditors give a bond to indemnify him in the event that the adjudication is not made; and even in that event he may give a forthcoming bond and retain possession of the property (see sec. 69, Possession of property).

Under the laws of the several States there is no adequate remedy for a debtor whose creditors institute compulsory proceedings; in almost every case the creditors dissipate a large part of the estate in litigation, and while some of them are paid in full, the majority are not paid any part of the amount due, and the debtor is left still owing the bulk of the debts, although at the inception of the litigation he may have been solvent. Under this bill the distribution of the assets will be precause to creditors of the same class (see sec. 65, Declaration and payment of dividends, sec. 60, Preferred creditors, and sec. 67, Liens). The debtor if honest will be discharged (see sec. 13, Discharges, when granted). It therefore seems evident that the position of both the debtor and creditors will be more advantageous under this act than under the present State laws.

It is not proposed to have acts of bankruptey secretly committed and then have the time in which proceedings may be instituted elapse before the creditors when the diligent creditor is enabled to learn of the commission of the act of bankruptcy (see Sec. 20, Acts of bankruptcy.)

Sec. 3. Who may become bankrupts.—There is already in existence a satisfactory law for the control and liquidation of mational banks. Since the Government is responsible for the money issued by these banks in the event of their failure there is a good reason why it should have control of their liquidation.

It is said that persons engaged chiefly in farming or the tillage of the soil liquidation.

It is said that persons engaged chiefly in farming or the tillage of the soil and wage-earners do not wish to become subjected to involuntary bankruptey; the bill does not therefore include them among the persons who may become involuntary bankrupts; objection would not be made if they should ask its extension to them. They may voluntarily take the benefits of the

The difference between voluntary and involuntary bankrupts consists only in whether the petition is filed by the bankrupt or his creditors. After the adjudication the rights and responsibilities of all bankrupts and their credi-

Sec. 4. Fariners.—The administration of the affairs of partners is similar to that of the individual. If there is a solvent member of the partners his he may settle its affairs and account to the estates of the bankrupts.

Sec. 5. Exemptions of bankrupts—The recognition of the State exemptions by a bankrupt law was contested under the last act upon the ground that since the several State laws did not exempt the same amount of property the bankrupt law was not uniform, and was therefore unconstitutional. The law was held to be constitutional by the courts.

Congress would not pass a law which would interfere with the State exemptions as the Representatives from the States whose exemptions are smaller than the one proposed would vote against such a law because of the opposition of their constituents; on the other hand, the Representatives from the States whose exemptions were larger than the proposed law would vote against it for the same reuson.

Sec. 6. Duties of bankrupts.—In connection with subdivision (1) see sec. 55, Meetings of creditors; (2) see sec. 17, Jurisdiction of courts of bankrupts (28); (3) see sec. 58, Notices to creditors of passer of the courts of referees (6); (9) see sec. 55, Meetings of creditors, sec. 21, Evidence, and sec. 58, Notices to creditors of creditors, sec. 21, Evidence, and sec. 58, Notices to creditors.—Ordinarily the death or insanity of a bankrupt would abase the proceedings, but this bill provides that upon labered.

In order to enable the creditors to pass upon the honesty of a debtor and to calculate the worth of their claims, it has been provided that the debtor shall be examined in open court or at a meeting of his creditors, and file his schedule of property and list of creditors before the creditors and lie his schedule of property and list of creditors before the creditors, and tile his schedule of property and list of creditors before the creditors, and tile his schedule of property and list of creditors before the creditors and to be filed in court until it has been accepted by a majority in number and amount of the creditors and whatever is to be paid has been deposited subject to the order of the court. Sec. 35. Qualifications of referess.—Under the old law, unworthy relatives of judges were appointed in some districts to the desirable positions. It is believed that under this act favoritism will be avoided, and that in every instance the person best qualified to perform the duties will be appointed. Sec. 36. Oaths of office of referees.—The referees are assistant judicial officers, and are therefore required to take the same oath of office as judges.

SEC. 56. Voters at meetings of creditors.—It is expected that the creditors will take a more active part in the administration of the estate than under the old law, and hence specific provision has been made as to their rights as vofers at meetings.

SEC. 57. Proof and allowance of claims.—The allowance of aclaim is to be a simple and inexpensive process; justly so as a great majority of them will be bona fide and will be shown to be due by the books of the bankrupt; but ample provisions have been made for their reconsideration and a trial at their merits in order to prevent the perpetration of fraud.

SEC. 58. Notices to creditors.—The creditors will be notified by the refere of the various steps in the administration of the estate to the end that they may, if they so desire, be heard upon any subject connected with the administration of the estate.

SEC. 59. See sec. 18, Process, pleadings, and adjudications: sec. 19, Jury trials, and sec. 58, Notices to creditors a (8).

SEC. 60. Preferred creditors.—The giving and receiving of preferences is forbidden; it is not thought in the broadest sense and in the long run that they redound to the best interest of the party giving or receiving them.

Many solvent but temporarily pressed men have their property spent and their prospects blighted by a struggle between their creditors to secure preferences.

A debtor who is temporarily embarrassed and needs the counsel and advice of his creditors can not, under existing laws, secure it, because as soon as his condition is suspected or known compulsory processes are instituted by some of his creditors, and as a result he is financially ruined and rendered

The prevention of preferences will make it possible for debtors and creditors to meet and counsel together and will beget a conservative fone between them which will tend to prevent commercial failures and promote equity and fair dealing.

In the event of a composition being set aside or a discharge revoked, the title of the bankrupt to property acquired subsequent to the illing of the petition, and prior to the setting aside of the composition or the revocation of the discharge, will vest in the trustee, and all persons who have extended credit during such time will be paid in full out of the property before reditors holding claims of anterior dates will receive any payments. As a result, full faith and credit will be given to compositions which have been confirmed and discharges which have been granted. Mr. OATES. I ask permission to say before taking my seat that at the last session of Congress when a time was set for the consideration of this bill and we failed to enter upon it, I printed a speech consisting mostly of an analysis of the provisions of the bill more extensive than the foregoing. I have endeavored to supply every member of Congress with a copy of that speech; but if any gentleman has not received a copy I shall be glad to furnish him one.

Mr. KILGORE. I hope the gentleman will send me one.
Mr. OATES. Certainly. To-morrow I will supply all who desire them.

Mr. OATES. How long? During this day?

Mr. CULBERSON. Oh, possibly during this week or longer. There are quite a number of gentlemen here who desire to speak. Certainly they can not get through to-day or to-morrow.

Mr. OATES. But there will be plenty of time under the five-

Mr. CULBERSON. But there are a number of gentlemen

Mr. KILGORE. We have plenty of time. Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Chairman, I have given con-Mr. Within the siderable thought to this bill and to this subject, and nothing but a conviction that it is unwise to pass a bankrupt law at this time leads me to differ with my associates on the committee who have reported it.

There have been many bankrupt laws passed. The number is greater in England perhaps than in any other country; but no law has ever been found sufficiently satisfactory to remain any great length of time without modification or repeal. The first bankrupt law in England was the act of 34 and 35 Henry VIII. C. 4, which gave the lord chancellor power to sieze estates and divide them among the creditors. Then came 13 Elizabeth. C. divide them among the creditors. Then came is Edizabeth C. 7, restricting bankruptcy to traders. Following these were 4 Anne, C. 17, and 10 Anne, C. 15, which took away the criminal character. Next came 6 George IV, C. 16, allowing the debtor to procure his own bankruptcy, and 1 and 2 William IV, C. 56, which established a court of bankruptcy composed of six commissioners

During the next twenty years various amendments were passed. In 1847 jurisdiction was restored to the court of chancery; in 1849 the bankruptcy consolidation act was passed; in 1861 nontraders were made subject to bankruptcy, and in 1868 an amendment act enlarged the powers of nonassenting creditors, while in 1869 a new court of bankruptcy was established, with

This act was repealed by the act of December 19, 1803.

It was to have continued in force for five years, but was repealed in three. It provided only for the bankruptcy of involuntary bankrupts, and was limited to traders.

Persons could be adjudged bankrupt only on the petition of creditors.

The acts of bankruptcy were: First. Departure from the State.

Second. Concealment to avoid process.

Third. Willingly or fraudulently procure his property to be siezed on process

Fourth. Secretly convey or conceal his property.

Fifth. Make any fraudulent conveyance of property.

Sixth. Make or admit any false or fraudulent security or evidence of debt.

Seventh. Remain in prison two months for debt. Eighth. Escape from prison.

Ninth. Failing to give bail after written notice and causing attachments to be dissolved.

In this law every act of bankruptcy was a fraudulent act.

The next act of bankruptcy was that of August 19, 1841, which was repealed by act of March 3, 1843.

This act provided for both voluntary and involuntary bankruptcy. Acts of bankruptcy were confined to persons being mer-chants or using the trade of merchandise, all retailers of merchandise, all bankers, factors, brokers, underwriters, or marine insurers owing debts not less than $2,000.

Acts of bankruptcy were:

First. Departure from State, district, or Territory with intent to defraud his creditors.

Second. Concealment to avoid being arrested.

Third. Willingly or fraudulently procure himself to be arrested.

Fourth. Willingly or fraudulently procure his lands, goods, or chattels to be taken in execution.

Fifth. Remove or conceal his property to prevent it being levied on.

levied on.
Sixth. Make any fraudulent conveyance, assignment, sale, gift, or transfer of his property.
These are also what are known as acts of fraud by the bankrupt.
The last act—that of 1867—was approved March 2, 1867, and went into effect June 1, 1867. It was repealed by act approved June 7, 1878, which took effect September 1, 1878.
This act was amended by the act of June 22, 1874, which required one-fourth in number and one-third in value of debts proven to petition to have a man declared a bankrupt.
The act of July 26, 1876, page 102, provided that an assignment under the laws of the State should not be a bar to a discharge.

I call the attention of the committee to the fact that from the passage of the act of 1867 down to the date of its repeal, every passage of the act of 1867 down to the date of its repeat, every supplement and every bill affecting bankruptey made it more liberal to the bankrupt in cases of involuntary bankruptey.

The act under consideration is much more severe in its involuntary provisions than this last act in several respects:

First. It makes it an act of bankruptey to make an assignment for the benefit of creditors authorized by the laws of the States.

No other bankrupt law ever did this before in this country. Second. It makes it an act of bankruptcy to sell any property bought before it is delivered.

Third. It makes it an act of bankruptcy to sell any property to any person not a creditor for the purpose of giving a prefer-

Fourth. It limits the number of creditors who may petition to have a debtor adjudicated a bankrupt to those having claims amounting to $500; and where there are only eleven creditors of amounting to 500; and where there are only eleven creditors of the estate one may file the petition.

I call attention to the difference between this bill under consideration and the provisions of the act of 1867. Under the bill now before the committee it is not necessary to have more than one person to petition in case there were only eleven creditors, and only three are necessary in case there were more than eleven. No restriction is put on the amount of debts of the retitioners provided that each of and proventions. the petitioners provided they equal $500, and no restriction on that account is put on the number of petitioners. So under the bill, if it shall become a law, it will be easier to put a man in bankruptcy than it was under the act of 1867.

And on that point I call the attention of the committee to the particular reasons why the act of 1867 was so unpopular with the people. It was mainly because of the harshness of its provisions applying to involuntary bankruptey, and I think I am justified in the criticism that this bill is much more severe on the involuntary bankrupt, and will be more unpopular if it ever becomes a law because of this fact than was the law of 1867.

Mr. RAY. If the gentleman will permit me, I would like to call attention to this fact, whether it would not be possible under the provisions of this bill if a creditor with a claim of $499 could get two creditors to unite with him, one who held a claim for 75 cents and the other 25 cents, making up the entire $500—that is all that would be necessary, as I understand it—to force a man into bankruptcy under the provisions of the pending bill.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Of course that is true; but I will have to ask members to be kind enough to wait until I get through this part of my remarks after which I will gladly answers to require they may wish to ask swer any questions they may wish to ask.

In its penal provisions the pending bill is unreasonably harsh and severe. It provides that a bankrupt shall be punished by imprisonment for a period not exceeding two years on conviction of having transferred otherwise than in the ordinary course of business, and in the contemplation of bankruptcy, any property which he has obtained on credit.

It will be easy where a transfer is otherwise than in the ordinary course of business, to get a conviction, for the bankrupt must be held to contemplate a fact which soon thereafter occurs.

Legislation in this country and in England divides bankruptcy into two kinds—voluntary and involuntary.

Voluntary bankruptcy is where a person voluntarily becomes a bankrupt by petition on his inability to pay his debts.

The purpose is to be relieved from the payment of his debts, and startanew in business. In many laws passed, this great privilege is limited to traders and manufacturers, so as to encourage

The present law allows any person to become a bankrupt.
All bankrupt laws have at all times been unpopular with the great masses of the people, and have soon been repealed or modified after their enactment. In new countries they are most unpopular. This country has not yet reached the stage where a permanent bankrupt law can be maintained.

After periods of great financial distress and business depression it is proper to enact a voluntary bankrupt law to relieve those who have been most unfortunate. Such a condition existed at the close of our late war, and the bankrupt act of 1867 was properly passed, but no such depression of business exists now to warrant such a law.

A bankrupt law should never be passed in anticipation of business depression. Its effect is to hasten and bring on such a condition. After a country has passed through a period of depression, when the liabilities of honest man exceed their assets, then is the time for a temporary bankrupt law in this country.

England it is true has a perment haskery law but here.

England, it is true, has a permanent bankrupt law, but in England Parliament enacts the laws, while in this country forty-four States are constantly enacting laws, and any bankrupt law that we may pass will conflict with the laws of the States.

That is one reason why a bankrupt law is unpopular.

It weakens confidence and destroys credit. It is always followed by depreciated market values. It brings at once all the property of those who avail themselves of the law to a forced public sale.

A forced public sale in any community is always a disadvantage to the trade of that community. The stock of a boot and shoe merchant being sold at public auction in a country town supplies the people with cheap goods, cheaper than other merchants can sell them, supplies the demand for weeks to come and thus hurts other merchants and makes bankrupts of them.

When any very prominent and extensive dealer goes into bank-ruptcy he generally pulls smaller dealers in with him, who have to go because he did. When we come to consider that great quantities of all kinds of property will at once be thrown upon the market at forced sale to the highest bidders for cash, we can well understand how a bankrupt law will cheapen all kinds of

Mr. BOATNER. There is no such necessity provided for in this bill. The goods will be sold as the creditor may think for the best interest. There is nothing in the bill requiring them to be sold at a forced sale for what they will bring in cash.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I could answer that, but will have to ask the gentlemen to wait until I get through and then I will answer all questions.

Merchants who might otherwise get along in competition with other merchants suddenly find that they have to compete with trustees of bankruptestates who sell for what they can get regardless of what the article cost.

Farms, houses, lots, and real estate of all kinds, all kinds of farm produce, grain, hay, cattle, horses, sheep, clothing of all kinds, bonds, stocks, securities, everything that cost money is at once in the market for what it will bring. The result can only be a great lowering of the market price of everything.

In this way a bankrupt law injures the country.

I think it is generally conceded that we are now and have been during the past summer in a precarious condition financially. Many banks have failed, and many business houses have succumbed; but in most instances, through extensions and indulgencies by creditors, they have pulled through. Their assets have not been exposed to public sale.

If we had had a bankrupt law, the auction flag would have been flying in every square in our cities, towns, and villages, and at every four corners throughout the country.

and at every four corners throughout the country.

A bankrupt law is a sad remedy to apply in the present condition of the country. It would precipitate what we are all trying to avoid. It might be convenient and desirable for many individuals, but it would be a great misfortune to the public.

A bankrupt law can only work good to the persons who are thereby relieved of their debts. It is for them and them alone. It can only work injury to trade and the public.

The hardest times we have had in this country since the war was in the papin of 1873, when the lost bankrupt law was in full was in the panic of 1873, when the last bankrupt law was in full force. That law was thought by many to have been largely responsible for the panic of 1873.

INVOLUNTARY.

Let us now consider the involuntary bankrupt law; this bill is both voluntary and involuntary.

The involuntary provisions allow creditors to force a debtor into bankruptcy against his will.

The only persons benefited by involuntary bankruptcy are the creditors; the persons injured are the public by the forced sales of property, thereby depreciating the market value of all kinds of property—and the bankrupts themselves.

Various acts are set down in the bill as acts of bankruptcy—I need not enumerate them. Some are authorized by the laws of the States, thereby bringing a conflict between the laws of the States and the United States.

The only argument for an involuntary bankrupt law is to afford greater facility to creditors in the collection of debts.

This should never be done at a time when business depression exists. The legislative policy of all the States on such occasions to covered elements the debter. is to extend clemency to the debtor.

Stay laws and extension laws are then passed.

If the approaching winter is severe, as many predict it will be, the Legislatures of the States in session will pass stay laws and extension laws. They will grant indulgence to the debtor, while we are asked to permit the creditor to seize his property. Either one policy or the other is wrong; my judgment is that the States are right.

Indulgence to the debtor gives time and a breathing spell to debtors and the country while more prosperous times arrive.

The Roman law began by allowing the creditors to divide the carcass of the insolvent debtor among them. That was followed by imprisonment for debt which was long enforced in England and in this country. These finally gave way and the country has been doing a credit business largely upon faith in the hon esty of the debtor.

The debtor class is by far the larger, and any harsh or strin. gent law will be unpopular which does not restrict acts of bank.

A law which makes the misfortune of the debtor an act of bankruptcy could not be maintained

The bankrupt law of 1867 was twice amended and each time by restricting the acts of bankruptey. In 1874 it was amended, making one-fourth in number and one-third in value of the debts necessary to join in a petition to have a debtor adjudicated a bankrupt

Under this bill one creditor can petition where the creditors do not exceed eleven, and three where the creditors exceed This affords great opportunities for creditors to oppress debtors by threatening bankruptey in default of immediate pay.

The great majority of all business in this country is done on credit. If it was reduced to a cash basis the country would be greatly crippled; yet under this bill no man would be justified in incurring a debt, as he might be forced into bankruptcy if he was unable to meet it.

It does not really aid the creditor class, except as a whip or spur and threat to aid collection.

Under the bankrupt law of 1867, in force a little over eleven years, 5,543 persons became bankrupt in what is known as the western district of Pennsylvania, which comprises about onehalf of the entire population of the State and much more than onehalf of the territory of the State. It is impossible to obtain the average dividends paid to the unsecured creditors by these bank-The papers are in the hands of registers, trustees, and attorneys.

The clerk of the United States district court for the western district of Pennsylvania, holding office during the time the law was in force, an able, honest, and experienced gentleman, estimates that the average would not exceed 15 per cent.

Lawyers, registers, and other officials made a great deal of money out of the law, but the unsecured creditor was a loser by That law was very unpopular, and its repeal was demanded by the whole country

This bill has really no merits over the law of 1867.

Registers are called referees, and assignees trustees; but the general effect of this law will be the same as the old one, and if it becomes a law in a very short time it will be quite as unpopu-

This country is too big, has too many lawmaking bodies, and is too young for a permanent bankrupt law, and there is no demand at present for a temporary one. On the contrary, at this time especially, we should not pass a bankrupt law

The United States courts are not accessible to the great majority of the people, and for that reason have never been popular. In many of the older States the people in some localities are three or four hundred miles from the place where the cours usually sit. They never come in contact with them.

The practice is not understood by their lawyers.

This bill is lengthy and full of details. It provides a rule and guidance for every possible question that can be raised under the bill. It leaves nothing for the court but the ability to find the place in the bill where the matter under consideration is provided for.

In the first section of the first chapter it defines the meaning of the word "defeat" to include "defraud, delay, evade, hinder, and impede." Now, turning to the acts of bankruptcy, the third act of bankruptcy is, if any debtor "makes a trans er of any of his property with intent to defeat his creditors." It is, perhaps, fortunate for the creditor that the word "defeat" is thus defined in the bill, for without it no judge would ever have held that an intent to delay a creditor was an intent to defeat him.

Delay does not mean to defeat a claim. Delay is often necessary for the preservation and recovery of a claim.

The bill is in the interest of the creditor—the involuntary part of it. It is skillfully drawn—so skillful that it will be extremely difficult to keep out of bankruptcy.

A man in the ordinary course of business will be liable to tumble in at any time, wholly unaware that he was at all in

It will require a skillful lawyer, who shall have made this law a special study, to be constantly at hand, both to get into bankruptcy and to keep out.

The lawyers who live at the places where the United States courts sit will have a monopoly of the bankrupt practice, and those lawyers who attend to the general practice and their clients will be at their mercy.

It is said that a large majority of the country want a bankrupt law and that many petitions have been received for its passage. I am aware that there has been a constant effort on the part of some persons to pass a bankrupt law ever since the last one was repealed.

The "Judge Torrey bill" has been before Congress for, lo! these many years.
During last Congress, when the bill was up, I had only one request from my locality to support it, and he wanted to be appointed referee.

I have taken some pains to get at the true sentiment upon this Thave taken some pains to get at the true sentiment upon this subject. I have not done it by petitions or remonstrances. I have written to a few of the leading judges in our different States, asking them to state what they thought about the passage of a bankrupt law at this time. These gentlemen sit upon the benches of our highest courts. They are constantly face to face with their misfortunes, and their wants. They have all been people, their misfortunes, and their wants. They have all been in active practice or on the bench during the last bankrupt law. They are eminent for their ability as lawyers and their fairness as men.

Some of them have kindly answered my inquiries and have given me leave to submit their views to the House. I ask the Clerk to read a letter from Judge Mitchell, of the supreme court of Pennsylvania, on this subject. The Clerk read as follows:

PITTSBURG, October 16, 1893.

MY DEAR SIE: Your letter of the 14th is just received, and I reply promptly. My experience in general is not favorable to a bankrupt law. Though the power to pass such a law was put in Congress by the Constitution, no exercise of it has ever been satisfactory to the country or has been more than temporary in duration. I had considerable experience in the working of the last act, and I believe it to have been intricate, cumbersome, expensive, and oppressive, and I do not telleve any new act can be drawn which will be any better in those respects, because the difficulties are inherent. Only the hard cases will ever come under the operation of such a law. Those easy of adjustment will always be settled out of court—the commercial spirit will compel such settlement.

cases will ever come under the operation of such a law. Those easy of adjustment will always be settled out of court—the commercial spirit will compel such settlement.

When cases come into court the fees and expenses must be heavy, or the business will be unprofitable, and inevitably fall into the hands of the less competent or lower-toned members of the profession, and become a source of oppression and scandal, as in fact the pension business so largely has, while if they are heavy the dividends for creditors will be small in proportion to expenses, which always produces dissatisfaction, as it perhaps justily ought. If we look beyond these practical objections to the subject in a broader aspect, there are two main objects which a bankrupt act may intended to promote, the relief of debtors or the facilitating of creditors.

The former is now cared for by the State laws to the satisfaction of their own communities, in which the bulk of indebtedness is generally owed, and there does not appear at present to be any substantial reason or demand for the exertion of the paramount national authority on the subject. Perhaps in a short time there unfortunately may be. For the other, the putting of severer remedies in the hands of the creditors, the time appeared to me particularly inappropriate. If the present financial situation shall continue there will certainly in a year or two be a vast body of debtors unable, not by their fault, but by misfortune, to pay promptly or in full. To put in the creditor's hands now, in advance of such a cortingency, any additional weapons of compulsion would, in my judgment, be oppressive and particularly ill-timed.

I have answered your query at more length than is desirable, but I have had no time to condense. While written hastily, these are my settled views, and you are quite at liberty to make such use of them as you desire.

Yours very truly,

JAMES T. MITCHELL.

To Hon. WILLIAM A. STONE, Washington, D. C.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I send up a letter from Judge Henry W. Williams, of the supreme court of Pennsylvania, which I ask the Clerk to read:

The Clerk read as follows;

My Dear Sir: Your favor relating to the subject of bankruptcy and the passage of a bankrupt law is before me. In reply I must say that it is my belief that the passage of such a law would not be wise for several reasons, among which are the following:

First, it would not facilitate the collection of debts. Except in rare cases, except in rare instances, no bankrupt law does. The real purpose and the direct result of such legislation is to enable an insolvent to shake off his debts—pay them by his certificate of discharge.

Second. It would naturally tend to increase existing distrust. It would be regarded as a Congressional declaration that bankruptcy and distress were before us, and that existing debts might be paid by a discharge in bankruptcy. Third. In so far as such a law should place in the hands of creditors any additional means of constraint or coercion upon their debtors, such means would be so used by exacting conditions as to increase the difficulty in the way of every struggling business man, and make his ruin certain.

Fourth. Both the honest dector and the humane creditor would suffer from the practical operation of such a law, while the estate would be consumed in fees and costs.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I ask the Clerk to read a letter from Judge Earl, of the court of appeals of the State of New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEAR SIR: In reply to your letter asking my views as to a bankruptcy law, I have to say I know of no good reason for passing such a law. I speak only of this State. Here the laws are just to both debtor and creditor, and no chauge is needed. They furnish ample facilities for the collection of debts, and an honest debtor, who has unfertunately become insolvent, can nearly always obtain a discharge from his debts by a surrender of his property. Bankruptcy proceedings have always proven expensive, and, unless the bankrupt estate is large, the lawyers and officials always get more of it than the creditors.

bankrupt estate is lar than the creditors. Very truly, yours,

Hon. WILLIAM A. STONE

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I ask the Clerk to read a letter from Judge Dean, of the supreme court of Pennsylvania. The Cleak read as follows:

The Cleak read as follows:

Dear Sir: Yours of the 14th, in reference to the bankrupt law, is before me. Such a law is of course intended to accomplish, first, protection to the creditor; second, relief of the debtor: third, material advantage to the State. Not much need be said as to the first and third, but as to the second, relief to the debtor, such a law passed now to take effect seon—and by soon is meant within two or three years—will operate with unnecessary hardship on the debtor class. This, as you are aware, is a time of serious business depression; fully 75 per cent of all men in business are heavy debtors. They have of real value ample assets in most cases.

These assets can not be turned into money at half their real value, and creditors will accept nothing but money. These debts have been incurred in view of existing laws: in great part they would have had no existence if such a law had been anticipated, and sudden change in the law will work financial disaster to many of them who, if not disturbed for a reasonable time, will squeeze through and have left considerable capital; if forced to a sale now, their property will not bring half its worth, and after discharge they will start without capital. While a national bankruptey law ought to be passed, it should not go into effect for at least two years. It is with some diffidence I give expression to this opinion. As you are aware, my judicial observation extends no further than this State, but while limited as to territory, all imaginable kinds of business carried on in the State have been brough to my attention both on and off the bench.

Very truly, yours,

Hon. WILLIAM A. STONE, Washington, D. C.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I ask the Clerk to read a letter from Judge Spear, of the supreme court of Ohio. The Clerk read as follows:

STATE OF OHIO, SUPREME COURT CONSULTATION ROOM, Columbus, October 20, 1893

DEAR SIR: Your valued favor of recent date is duly received.

In general, I favor a uniform bankrupt law, if framed so as to be fair to both creditor and debtor, and the fees of court officers so limited as to admit of economical administration. Such a law would be, I think, more advantageous to all concerned than are the present inconsistent insolvent laws of the several States.

But I doubt very much the advisability of enacting such a law at this time. It seems to me that if made a law now the compulsory provisions would give inconsiderate creditors an undue advantage, and would result in driving many deserving debtors into bankruptcy, who, If not unduly crowded, would struggle through and finally avoid financial ratin, which result would certainly tend to further complicate the unfortunate financial disturbances which are now troubling the business world.

These suggestions are but first-blush impressions, and are not recarded by made to them.

made to them.
Yours, very respectfully,

Hon. WM. A. STONE, Washington, D. C.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I have other letters, Mr. Chairman, but I will not take the time to read them. If any member desires them read they can be read in his time, or I will publish them in the RECORD if desired.

I wish now to say something with reference to the provisions of this bill. Under the act of 1867 corporations could become voluntary bankrupts, but under this bill they could be forced into bankruptey, while they could not become bankrupts by pe-

A corporation could become a bankrupt by petition under the act of 1867. By this bill a corporation can only become a bankrupt where it commits an act of bankruptcy. Now, if a corporation, finding itself in an insolvent condition, desires to take advantage of the provisions of this bill, it has only to commit an act of bankruptcy in order to get in at the back door.

Another peculiar feature of this bill is that under it a corporation gas not be disabased.

ration can not be discharged. But this is futile, because the trustee can sell the charter as well as the assets of the corporation, and it can reorganize under the laws of the State. Nearly all the States provide for the reorganization of corporations.

The charter is an asset as well as anything else. The last bankruptcy law was much more wise in its treatment of corporations than is this bill. It treated them as persons and gave them all the rights and privileges of persons. Under the act of 1867 a person, to become a voluntary bankrupt, must owe at least $300. Under this bill he may owe any amount. One dollar is sufficient toput a man into bankruptcy on his own petition. The gentleman who opened this debate stated that the act of 1867 was very unpopular, and he said he would not support such a bill.

I simply want to call attention to the discrepancies between these two laws, believing that the act of 1867 was more humane, more impartial, and more in the interest of the public than this

Under the act of 1867 voluntary bankrupts must reside in the United States, but under this bill they may reside anywhere. A person living in France might become a bankrupt, or might file a patition to have a citizen of Pennsylvania adjudicated a bankrupt, under this bill.

Under this bill a bankrupt could only be discharged by the judge. Here is a feature to which I desire to call especial attention. An application may be made at any time after two months from the date of adjudication in bankruptcy. The judge shall hear the application and discharge the bankrupt, unless he has performed or done certain things; and if we turn to page 15, we will find what those things are that prohibit the judge from discharging bankrupter. charging bankrupts:

(1) Committed an offense punishable by imprisonment or fine as herein provided; (2) given a preference as herein defined, under an assignment for the benefit of creditors, or otherwise, which has not been surrendered to the trustee; (3) knowingly made a materially false statement in writing concerning his financial condition to any person for the purpose of obtaining credit or of being communicated to the trade or to those from whom he has sought or obtained credit—

The word "material" is inserted in this section. Unless he as "made a materially false statement." Well, in the light of has "made a materially false statement." subsequent insolvency, it is a very easy matter to make out that a statement, made in good faith at the time, was materially false. It does not say "false." It says "materially false."

(4) made a transfer of any of his property which any creditor, who has proved his debt in the proceedings, might, at the time of the bankruptcy, have impeached as fraudulent if he had then been a judgment creditor, unless such property shall have been surrendered to the trustee—

It is not necessary to have it impeached. If it might have been impeached, in the opinion of the judge, the discharge must or (5) with fraudulent intent destroyed or neglected to keep books of account or records from which his true condition might be ascertained.

Now, there are a great many people in business who do not keep sufficient books or records of accounts by which their condition can be ascertained. A great many people in business do not keep books at all. Now, when a petition for a discharge is filed, it is addressed, not to the court, but to the judge. I have recited the reasons which shall prevent the judge from granting the discharge.

Under the act of 1867, the bankrupt could not obtain a dis-charge unless the assets equaled 30 per cent of the debts proved against his estate, or on the assent of one-fourth in number and one-third in value of his creditors. No such requisition is necessary under this bill. It is a matter wholly and solely with the judge. The creditors have nothing to do with it.

In this bill no assets are required, nor is the discharge with-In this bill no assets are required, nor is the discharge withheld without the assent of creditors. The matter is in the sole discretion of the judge. An appeal may be taken to the order of the judge, but there is no provision for a jury trial over the issues of facts. The judge shall discharge unless the bankrupt shall have done one of five things, and, as an involuntary bankrupt, he must have done at least one of these things; and as the judge has in adjudicating him a bankrupt already passed upon that question, I see no way in which an involuntary bankrupt can ever be discharged.

Now, let us think of this for a moment. Mind you, this bill exceptibly excludes the province of the jury in an issue raised on carefully excludes the province of the jury in an issue raised on an application for a discharge. The judge must first withhold discharge if the bankrupt has committed—not been convicted but committed any offenses punishable by fine or imprisoment. Now we look at the offenses punishable by fine or imprisonment, beginning on page 27, if the House will bear with me, as this is more of a technical argument than a speech.

I now turn to the offenses:

A person shall be punished by imprisonment for a period not to exceed two years upon conviction of the offense of having willfully—

Then it goes on and recites the offenses.

Now, it does not say the court may fine, imprison, or both. It says that the person shall be imprisoned, and then it gives the first

There is no objection to that-

(2) attempted to account or accounted for any of his property, or attempted to account or accounted while a bankrupt for any of the property belonging to his estate by fictitious losses or expenses; (3) concealed while a bankrupt, or after his discharge, from his trustee any of the property belonging to his estate; (4) in case of any person having to his knowledge after he has become a bankrupt, proved a false chaim against his estate, failed to disclose that fact, within one month after coming to a knowledge thereof, to his trustee; (5) made a false oath in, or in relation to, any proceeding in bankruptcy; (6) made a substantially—

made a substantially false valuation, as a bankrupt, of any of the property of his estate in his schedule of property, or omitted therefrom any of the property of his estate, or from the list of his creditors any person to whom he is indebted in a substantial amount, or included therein any person to whom he is not indebted, or included therein a creditor for an amount substantially more than the true indebtedness;—

The word "substantially" precedes the word "valuation," and it may be construed that a bankrupt has violated this provision who has valued his property a little too high. It may be substantially false, but not false fraudulently, and willfully, and wickedly false, but substantially false.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Substantially untrue.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Substantially untrue; and for this reason a bankrupt may be prosecuted, tried, and convicted, and if convicted must be imprisoned; from which there is no es. cape. There are other offenses, amounting to eleven in all, and as you increase the number they grow more and more a net, which might catch an honest, but perhaps unskillful man in bookkeeping-

(7) obtained on credit any property with intent not to pay for the same or with intent to use the same to prefer a creditor or increase his property in contemplation of bankruptcy;—

Well, under that provision the intent will be construed by the act, and if the bankrupt obtains property which he did not pay for, it would be very easy for debtors and for creditors, and for the judge even to say that he never intended to pay for it—

(8) presented any false, or substantially exaggerated, claim for proof against the estate of a bankrupt, or used or offered to use any such claim in composition personally or by agent, proxy, or attorney, or as agent, proxy, or attorney;—

That does not apply to the bankrupt-

(9) received any property or the promise of the same, or paid or promised to pay any property as a consideration to act or forbear to act in any proceeding in bankruptcy; (10) secreted any of his property to avoid its being levied upon under legal process against himself or administered in bankruptcy, or any document relating to his property or which is a part of or relates to an estate in his charge; or (11) transferred otherwise than in the ordinary course of his business, and in contemplation of bankruptcy, any property which he has obtained on credit.

Well, now, under the last provision a bankrupt who has trans-Well, now, under the last provision a bankrupt who has transferred his property otherwise than in the ordinary course of business would be guilty, and that will be a question for the judge to consider and construe whether the transfer was in the ordinary course of business or not, or whether in contemplation of bankruptcy any property that he had obtained on credit has been transferred. Any property paid for in cash he may transfer as he pleases; but if the property was obtained on credit and if the transfer be in any manner that the court holds not to be in the ordinary course of business he can not be discharged and he is liable to be imprisoned.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. In other words, he may not prefer cred-

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. It does not make any difference whether he prefers creditors. If he sells a horse, and it should be held not to be in the ordinary course of business, whether the creditor was preferred or not, if he sells it for less than the value he would come in under that section.

Now, under this bill, if given a preference, which has not been esorted to for a dishonest purpose, the bankrupt can not be discharged. If a person doing business in a country town, buying goods from a merchant, and giving his notes for the payment, when one of them becomes due he borrows the money from his has no money to pay it; and if, when the other note comes, and he has no money to pay it, and he can borrow no more, he prefers that neighbor by giving him a judgment, which would give him a first lien, he falls under a subdivision of this law, and by reason of its provisions he is prevented from being discharged. "knowingly made a materially false statement in writing to any person to obtain credit or been communicated to the trade."

Now, then, we all know that there are two great firms which undertake to keep creditors posted as to the financial condition of business men in the country. They are known as Dunn and Bradstreet. "Communicated to the trade" means any merchant who has given a statement to either of these firms. It comes out in their published reports. If a man makes a statement not false, but materially false, under this section, he can not be discharged.

Fourth. Made transfers of any of his property which a creditor could have impeached, etc.

It does not make any difference whether the creditor did impeach it or not; if the judge holds that he could have impeached it he is bound to withhold the discharge.

Fifth. Neglected to keep books of account, etc.

How would a man ever get out?

If he has been adjudicated for the eighth act of bankruptcy, having secreted his property, he has committed the tenth offense and can not be discharged.

If adjudicated for the sixth act of bankruptcy, he has committed the tenth offense and can not be discharged.

If he has been adjudicated under the fourth or sixth act of bankruptcy the record shows him already barred from discharge.

If adjudicated for the third act of bankruptcy, his discharge If adjudicated for the fourth reason. And when we consider the definitions put upon words, acts, and phrases, it becomes entirely impossible for any involuntary bankrupt to be discharged at all. Now let us look at these provisions. In section 13 of the bill (page 15) provision is made as to discharge. It says:

The judge shall hear the application for a discharge, and such pleas as may be made in opposition thereto by parties in interest, at such time as his convenience will permit and as will give parties in interest a reasonable opportunity to be heard, and discharge the applicant unless he has (1) committed an offense punishable by imprisonment or fine as herein provided; (2) given a preference as herein defined, under an assignment for the benefit of creditors, or otherwise, which has not been surrendered to the trustee; (3) knowingly made a materially false statement in writing concerning his financial condition to any person for the purpose of obtaining credit or of being communicated to the trade or to those from whom he has sought or obtained credit; (4) made a transfer of any of his property which any creditor, who has proved his debt in the proceedings, might, at the time of the bankruptcy, have impeached as fraudulent if he had then been a judgment creditor, unless such property shall have been surrendered to the trustee; or (5) with fraudulent intent destroyed or neglected to keep books of account or records from which his true condition might be ascertained.

The confirmation of a composition shall discharge the bankrupt from his debts other than those agreed to be paid by the terms of the composition and those not affected by a discharge.

SEC, 14. Discharges, when Revoked.—The court may, upon the application of parties in interest who have not been guilty of undue laches, filed at any time within two years after a discharge shall have been granted, revoke t upon a trial.

We turn then to the provision as to courts, on page 25, where

We turn then to the provision as to courts, on page 25, where we find this:

SEC. 25. a Appeals and writs of error.—Controversies involving in amount $8500 and over, adjudications upon petitions, the granting or refusal of applications for the removal of cases and the granting and dismissals of petitions for discharges, may be taken from courts of bankruptby, within ten days after the granting of the order or the entry of the judgment complained of, unless further time be granted by the judge, to their respective appellate tribunals, by appeal or writ of error, pursuant to the provisions of the United States laws now in force upon that subject or such as may be herefiter enacted, except that the same shall be returnable within ten days, unless further time be granted by the appellate court.

b Trustees shall not be required to give bonds when they take appeals or sue out writs of error.

c Controversies may be certified to the Supreme Court of the United States from other courts of the United States, and the former court may exercise jurisdiction thereof and issue writs of certiorari pursuant to the provisions of the United States laws now in force or such as may be hereafter enacted.

In other words, the judge makes the order of discharge. That order may be appealed to the supreme courts of the Territory, or to the circuit court, and it may go up to the Supreme Court of the United States, but there is no provision whatever for a jury to determine the question of fact embodied in a specification against the discharge. The provision for jury trials carefully excludes that. Turning to section 19 we find the provision made as to jury trials. No bankruptcy act in the world, I take it, ever vested solely in the judge the right to determine the issues raised by specifications against the bankrupt's discharge. When a bankrupt makes application for a discharge the creditors who desire to object to that discharge, having notice, file their objections that he has committed this or that act of bankruptcy, or that he is barred under the law, and that goes to a jury to be determined as other questions of fact are determined. But that is not the provision under this bill. The provision here as to jury trials is this:

SEC. 19. 6 Jury trials.—A person against whom an involuntary petition has been filed shall be entitled to have a trial by jury, in respect to any act of bank-ruptcy alleged in such petition to have been committed, upon filing a written application therefor before the expiration of the time within which an answer may be filed. If such application is not filed within such time a trial by jury shall be deemed to have been waived.

That provides for a jury trial, but that refers to an act of bankruptcy when a petition is filed to have a person adjudged an involuntary bankrupt.

Now, on page 21, subdivision "c," we find that-

The right to submit matters in controversy or an alleged offense under this act to a jury shall be determined and enjoyed according to the United States laws now in force upon that subject, or such as may be hereafter en-acted, except as herein provided.

And it is herein provided that the judge shall pass upon the questions—all of them—and discharge the applicant, unless he has done some one of the very many things enumerated in the bill. It does not provide that the judge shall take any evidence; it does not provide that he shall take any depositions; it provides no system under heaven by which he may determine the fact. He has already got a record.

Suppose that it is the case of an involuntary bankrupt. The judge looks at the petition; he has already passed judgment.

Suppose that it is the case of an involuntary bankrupt. The judge looks at the petition; he has already passed judgment upon the petitioner; he has adjudicated that man to be a bankrupt for doing some of the things for which he may be adjudicated a bankrupt, and the most of them are things which prevent the judge from granting the discharge. The judge looks at the record and finds that he has already passed judgment upon that question, and therefore it is an adjudicated fact.

ruptcy law some judges, in the early administration of it, were weak enough to hold that no involuntary bankrupt could be discharged because of the fact of his adjudication which was a matter of record. Time, liberality, the more wholesome and wise views of the Supreme Court of the United States, moderated those rulings, and in the last days of that act we began to have a uniform system of bunkruptcy uniformly administered. But, sir, it will be years and years before the judges will get together and be of one mind upon the administration of an act of bankruptcy containing all the various provisions and details of this long and cumbersome bill. It would be better, far better for the public to have that old bankrupt law of 1867 resnacted as it was administered, in the enlightened last days of its existance. administered in the enlightened last days of its existence -far administered in the eniightened last days of its existence—larbetter—than it would be to pass this bill.

In the great cities, Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Pittsburg, Chicago, St. Louis, San Francisco, large wholesale houses exist which sell bills of goods to men in any and every State of this Union. Under this bill, if it should become a law, they would be practically protected against what are known as "preferences" to neighbors and those with whom the debtor is intierences" to neighbors and those with whom the debtor is intimately connected, because if a man should commit an act of bankruptcy, he will know that he comes under this bill, and that he can hardly get out again. It can be used as a threat or as a whip over the poor debtors of the country. I do not say that it was intended as such. I believe that the gentleman [Mr.
OATES] who opened this debate is as sincere in his support of the bill as I am in my opposition to it; but I say that this bill is calculated, or at least that its effect will be, to benefit the creditors of the country and not the debtors.

Woe to the man upon whom the door of involuntary bank-ruptcy has closed under this law. He is an outcast from trade forever. His creditors can not even consent to his discharge. The judge can not discharge him, for he has already adjudged him guilty of the acts which bar his discharge. A jury of his countrymen can not relieve him. The provision "C," page 21, under head of "Jury Trials," can not relieve him, for the exception "as herein provided" prevents it, it being herein provided that the judge shall determine the question of discharge.

I will not run over all of these enumerated offenses, but I think the list is unreasonably severe. I have already commented on the fact that imprisonment must be imposed, and then when we come to consider how, with the definitions that are put upon words, phrases, and sections in the bill, it will be a very easy matter to convict almost any involuntary bankrupt of some one of these offenses. Then there is a long list of fines, any one of which might catch a man who was not learned and versed in the provisions of the bill. The bill also excludes attorneys from practicing in bankrupt cases while acting as referees.

This in my judgment is unwise. The duties of these refered are the same as the registrars under the old law, and under that law no one but an attorney or a man learned in the law was ever appointed to that position. No one but a man so qualified should be a referee under this bill. Yet attorneys are excluded from practicing in the bankruptcy courts, though under the old law they were allowed to do so.

The bill also requires two sureties. It may be well to have two sureties where they are individual sureties, but the bill extends this requirement to corporations authorized under State laws to become sureties. There is no need for this, and the bill should be amended in that respect.

Mr. Chairman, I honestly and sincerely believe that this bill, if it should become a law, will be a great injury to the public, will do more harm than it can possibly do good. I am opposed to the passage of any bankrupt law in these troublesome times, to the passage of any bankrupt law in these troublesome times, and most especially am I opposed to the passage of this measure.

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a very few words on this bankruptcy bill. I can not speak as an attorney, for I am not familiar with the law or its forms. But I wish to speak as one who has had extensive business interests in a number of different States of the Union. I have read the bill through carefully; and if I understand the effect of its terms and phrases it should, instead of being called a bankruptcy bill, be entitled more properly "A bill to divestall debtors of hope for the future and to prevent any debtor who may suffer from temporary embarrassment from ever securing his financial freedom." Why, Mr. Chairman, up in Pennsylvania—I say it with no disrespect—when we wish to perpetrate such an act as this bill seeks to perwhen we want to perpetrate such an act as this bill seems to perpetrate, we take a jimmy and a dark lantern, and we never proceed in the light of day; we take the small hours of the morning to get away with a scheme like this.

Mr. Chairman, I have noticed the report on this bill. The "immortal bard" is quoted, and I thought there ought to have been another quotation in the same connection. There should have been a quotation about "stealing the livery of the court of Heaven to serve the devil in." The glowing language of this report speaks about "poor debtors;" it speaks about the "quality of mercy;" and then it goes on and by terms and provisions gives a lot of little lawyers or of maliciously disposed persons the opportunity to bankrupt ninety-nine out of every hundred men who are doing business to day in the United States. I do not think I am in a condition at present to suffer in that way; but I know that for many years of my business experience there was not an hour when some malicious, evil-disposed person could not under a hill of this kind have forced me into bankruptor. not under a bill of this kind have forced me into bankruptcy

Mr. Chairman, in the name of every debtor of this land I protest against the confirmation, I will not say of this villainous, but of this iniquitous legislation. I do not know the truth or falsity of the charge that there is a lobby here in the interest of this bill; that there are people drawing salaries of $15,000 a year as the paid attorneys of a few persons who have organized themselves into an association for the collection of debts. But I have no reason to doubt the correctness of that statement, because no reason to doubt the correctness of that statement, because from none but that class of people could have emanated such harsh measures in dealing with debtors.

I will not go into the different phases of this subject; my time is too limited. But I do not see one redeeming feature in the measure. And instead of amending it in any line or section, I would cut the tail of this bill off behind its ears and leave it at that: for I doubt if there is a possibility of a worse measure on this subject ever being submitted. It is the most skillfully detected and carefully preserved measure. vised and carefully prepared measure I have ever seen for put-ting the clamps and the screws upon the unfortunate debtor, and holding him as long as the greed or hatred of the creditor is unsatisfied; it will act as an effectual closing of the doors of hope to his heart.

I heard a gentleman here speak of the commercial depression that exists to-day and the necessity for some such measure as this. I make the assertion that there is scarcely in New York City a bank that could not have been put into bankruptcy within the last ninety days under the provisions of this bill. This measure is simply another link in the chain that is being bound about the debtor class of this nation—another cord in the strand by which you are attempting to stifle the producing classes of this country; another whip in the hands of the taskmasters. I protest against this bill; and I rely upon the fairness and justice that I believe precall among the membership of this House to see that this bill is never enacted into law.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Chairman, as no one else wishes to speak this evening, I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and, the Speaker having resumed the Chair, Mr. OUTHWAITE reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 139) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. PEARSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution (H. The VICE-PRESIDENT (at 10 o'clock and 48 minutes a. m.). Forty-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator from Nevada yield to me to submit a report from a committee.

Mr. STEWART. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE.

Mr. BERRY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1986) to amend section 6 of the act approved March 3, 1891, entitled "An act to repeal timber-culture laws, and for other purposes," reported it without amendment.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. DAVIS presented resolutions adopted at a mass meeting of citizens of Duluth, Minn., favoring the repeal of the silver-pur-chasing clause of the so-called Sherman law; which were ordered citizens of Minneapolis, Minn., and the petition of Cyrus Northrup and others of the faculty of the University of Minnesota, praying for the repeal of the so-called Geary Chinese law; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CAMERON presented a memorial of citizens of Roscoo,
Pa., and two memorials of sundry citizens of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the unconditional repeal of the silver-purchasing clause of the so-called Sherman law; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BRICE presented petitions of the Cineinnati Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, assembled at Troy, Ohio, August 30, 1893; of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society, of Cineinnati, Ohio, and of David Morrow, of Oakland, Cal., praying for the repeal of the so-called Geary Chinese law:

which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented petitions of John H. Patterson, president of the National Cash Register Company, of Dayton, Ohio; of the Board of Trade of Massillon, Ohio; of the Commercial Club of Cincinnati, Ohio; of the Bimetallic League of Canton, Ohio, and of the Stock Exchange of Cincinnati, Ohio, praying for the speedy repeal of the so-called Sherman silver law; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of 38 citizens of Morgan County Ohio, praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the freer and more extended use of silver as money of ultimate redemption and thereby check the continued contraction of the currency, which has been, and is now, sinking the free labor of our land deeper and deeper into the mire of enforced idleness.

our land deeper and deeper into the mire of enforced idleness, penury, and despair; which was ordered to lie on the table. He also presented a petition of Mayflower Assembly, No. 469, Knights of Labor, of Zanesville, Ohio, praying for equal recognition of silver with gold in coinage at the United States mints, that the ratio of 16 to 1 be maintained, and remonstrating against the repeal of the so-called Sherman silver law unless some provision be made for the free and unlimited coinage of silver; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of the Board of Trade of Galli-polis; of the Chamber of Commerce of Cincinnati; of the Ohio Association of Productive Industries; of the Manufacturers' Association of Cincinnati: of the Freight Bureau of Cincinnati; of the Merchants and Manufacturers' Association of Cincinnati; and of the Commercial Club of Cincinnati, all in the State of Ohio, praying that their representatives in Congress use their best efforts to secure prompt action on the repeal bill now pending in the Senata; which were ordered to lie on the table.

ing in the Senate; which were ordered to lie on the table. He also presented a memorial of Hamer Grange, No. 451, Patrons of Husbandry, of Georgetown, Ohio, remonstrating against the repeal of the so-called Sherman silver law, unless coupled with a provision restoring the free coinage of both gold and silver as it existed prior to the passage of the act of 1873; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. QUAY presented a petition of citizens of Wayne, Pa., praying for the unconditional repeal of the so-called Sherman silver law; which was ordered to lie on the table.

wer law; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Union League, of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the resumption of specie payments, the maintenance of a currency which, whether in gold, silver, or notes, shall be of equal purchasing power, and for the prompt repeal of the silver-purchasing clause of the so-called Sherman law: which was ordered to lie on the table.

law: which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. QUAY. I have received a letter from Henry C. Dingee, a prominent business man of the city of Philadelphia, who was a signer of a memorial of the members of the Manufacturers' Club of Philadelphia in relation to tariff and financial legislation, suggesting several practical measures. The memorial was presented by my colleague [Mr. CAMERON] in my absence, and I do not remember its contents exactly. Mr. Dingee writes saying that he desires to withdraw his signature, having since he signed the memorial come to the conclusion that the only solution of the presentfinancial difficulty is the unconditional repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman act. I know no method by which he can withdraw his signature, but perhaps the statement I make will answer his purpose. ment I make will answer his purpose.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BUTLER introduced a bill (S. 1124) for the relief of aged and infirm colored people; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. BUTLER. I desire to state that I introduce this bill as a substitute for the joint resolution I introduced some time ago on the same subject. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BRICE introduced a bill (S.1125) to provide for the erechasing clause of the so-called Sherman law; which were ordered blie on the table.

He also presented the petition of George R. Merrill and other on Public Buildings and Grounds.

PURCHASE OF SILVER BULLION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. I) to repeal a part of an act approved July 14, 1890, entitled "An act directing the purchase of silver bullion and the issue of Treasury notes thereon, and for other purposes," the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. PEFFER to the substitute reported by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. STEWART. I think we ought to have a quorum here, because I have a good many important things to say. It would please me to say them to a full Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. TELLER. Let the rule be read.
Mr. TURPIE. The statement in raising the question of a quorum ought to contain the facts upon which the subsequent proceedings are to be based. It may lead to the arrest of a Senator. It ought to contain a statement of facts in themselves sufficient to disclose the absence of a majority of the members of the Senate and the presence of only a minority. I have heard several times the attempt made to raise the

I have heard several times the attempt made to raise the question of the presence of a quorum on the other side of the Chamber. I have never heard it raised except once or twice in the proper manner. I have heard the phrase used, "Mr. President, I call a quorum," or "Mr. President, I call for a quorum." That certainly does not raise the question. I have heard it said there are not 43 members here. That certainly does not raise the question. There might be 80. I have heard the question of a quorum raised by persons who had the charge of public business, and whose duty it was to do it, and I have always heard it raised by a statement of facts which excluded the posheard it raised by a statement of facts which excluded the possibility of there being a majority present, and which in itself implied the absence of such majority. These facts were not a mere conclusion of law. They did not embody the language of mere conclusion of law. They did not embody the language of the rule. It is not my purpose now to state what the language should be. There is no form requisite, but whatever the formula may be, it ought to include a statement of the facts upon which the call is founded. A request for the attendance of absentees on which a direction to compel the attendance of the absent is founded is a statement of facts giving jurisdiction to this body upon it, and clearly showing the absence of the requisite number that constitute a quorum.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the rule The SECRETARY. Rule V, section 2, is as follows:

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] is entitled to the floor on the unfinished business.

Mr. BATE. The Senator from Nevada consents that I may call up a bill which it is necessary to have passed at once. It is merely a bill for a bridge across the Tennessee River.

Mr. STEWART. I have no objection, if I do not lose my right to the floor.

Mr. CULLOM. We do not hear the Senator from Tennessee

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee will please state again his request.

Mr. BATE. It is a bill where a charter has been granted by the State of Tennessee to the Chattanooga Western Railway the State of Tennessee. Company to put a bridge across the Tennessee River, a navigable stream, and the company asks the consent of the Government. ment There is no objection to the bill, and it will not take any time, except that there are some amendments reported from the Committee on Commerce. It will involve no discussion whatever, and I ask that the bill be put on its passage.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee?

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 339) to authorize the Chattanooga Western Railway Company to construct a bridge across the Tennessee River near Chattanooga.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was in section 2, line 11, after the word "telegraph," to insert "and telephone;" so as to read:

And equal privileges in the use of said bridge shall be granted to all telegraph and telephone companies.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 2, line 19, after the word "and," to insert "whatever kind of bridge is constructed;" so as to read:

And whatever kind of bridge is constructed said corporation shall maintain, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 3, line 4, after the word "thereto," to strike out the following words:

Upon the payment of their proportion of maintenance, operation, and interest on investment from the date upon which said railway companies begin to use the bridge in any manner, and so long as they shall continue to use the same, the amount or said proportion to be calculated upon a wheelage basis or other.

So as to read:

That all railroad companies desiring the use of said bridge shall have, and be entitled to, equal rights and privileges relative to the passage of railway trains over the same, and over the approaches thereto, upon such basis or arrangement as may be agreed upon by and between such companies and the Chattanooga Western Railway Company.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VEST. In section 5, at the end of line 21, I move to insert the words "the location or construction of;" so as to read:

And if any litigation shall be had in regard to the location or construction said bridge, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TowLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H.R.9) to transfer the Morris Island life saving station, near Charleston, S. C., to Sullivans Island; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PURCHASE OF SILVER BULLION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 1) to repeal a part of an act approved July 14, 1890, entitled "An act directing the purchase of silver bullion and the issue of Treasury notes thereon, and for other purposes."

Mr. STEWART resumed the floor. After having spoken an hour and a quarter, he said: I ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed to finish my speech hereafter, and that my colleague [Mr. Jones of Nevada], who is not feeling well, may be allowed to occupy a portion of the time now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nevada?

The Chair hears none.

Mr. JONES of Nevada addressed the Senate in continuation of the speech begun by him on the 14th instant. After having spoken over two hours and a half, he said:

Mr. President, I will now give way to my colleague [Mr. STEWART], who yielded the floor to me that I might proceed, and I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate to conclude my remarks at another time, perhaps to-morrow.

I also wish to again state that it is not the intention of any one connected with this discussion to prolong it any more than is necessary to give his views fully to the Senate and to the people of the country.

Mr. FAULKNER. Being satisfied that the remarks of the Senator from Nevada correctly state the position of those who are opposed to the pending bill, I move that the Senate now take a recess until 11 o'clock to morrow morning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from West Virginia.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 57 minutes p. m., Tuesday, October 24) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, October 25, 1893, at 11 o'clock, a. m.

The joint resolution was read at length.

Inte for has now the authority to consolidate or rearrange the land districts. That resolution seems to be somewhat in the nature of a suggestion to the Secretary.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the gentleman from California will explain the purpose of the resolution.

Mr. CAMINETTI. Mr. Speaker, I will, with the consent of the House, explain the object of the resolution.

It will be remembered that in the sundry civil appropriation bill of the last Congress a provision was inserted providing that the land districts in the United States might be reduced ten in number. It was determined that one district should be taken from California, to which we have no objection. But in consolidating two districts to give the necessary reduction of one district they paid no attention to the topography of the country, and have consolidated two districts, the bulk of the land in one of them, the Independence land district, being on the eastern side of the Sierra Nevadas and the land in the Visalia district on the western side of the mountains, which for eight months of the year are impassable, and therefore settlers eight months of the year are impassable, and therefore settlers upon the public lands in the Independence land district, in order to go to Visalia, must make a journey of 1,300 miles, at greatexpense of time and money.

Now, we desire on the part of the people of those districts to be heard on this consolidation—that is, to be permitted to present the facts before the Secretary of the Interior with a view to allow the consolidation to be made somewhere else, where there will be less hardship to the settlers.

Mr. SAYERS. What is the purport of the resolution?

Mr. CAMINETTI. It is to make provision to enable the Representatives in Congress from the St to of California, or anywhere else, who desire to be heard in relation to the facts of the matter, to be heard, and that upon a full hearing the consolidation may take place in regard to two other districts, eliminating the Independence district, and letting it remain as formerly, owing to the great expense this change will entail upon the settlers

Mr. SAYERS. Have not you a right to be heard without this resolution?

Mr. CAMINETTI. No, sir.

Mr. SAYERS. Why?
Mr. CAMINETTI. Because the matter is a finality now.
Under the act of Congress to which I have already referred the consolidation of the districts, or the order for that purpose, has already been made, and nothing can be done now except by act of Congre

WILSON of Washington. You state that the consolidation has been made. Mr. CAMINETTI.

WILSON of Washington. Have the transcripts of the

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Have the transcripts of the records been completed?

Mr. CAMINETTI. I do not know.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I have it on very reliable information that it will cost more to transcribe the records of the consolidated districts than to maintain the districts.

Mr. CAMINETTI. That may be true.
Mr. WILSON of Washington. And permit me one moment more. Inasmuch as the entire expenses of the local land office and of the General Land Office are paid by the settlers in the West, why not continue an arrangement which has been for their convenience, when it involves no expense upon the Goy.

Mr. CAMINETTI. That is another question, which is not before us now

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Well, that is a fact at all events

Mr. CAMINETTI. In this case the order has already been made by the Secretary of the Interior and signed by the President, and is now in force.

I am not attempting, I will state, to prevent the reduction of the districts. I am willing to allow the reduction to take place where less harm would result. Now, to every settler in the Independence district there will be caused an expense of nearly or quite $100, just to save to the Government $1,200 a year.

Mr. DOCKERY. In reply to the gentleman from Washington
[Mr. Wilson] let me say that there is nothing in the law to which he refers, as I understand it, which is compulsory. The whole matter was relegated to the Secretary of the Interior by an act of the last Congress, giving him the right to consolidate the districts if in his judgment the public interest would thereby be

Mr. WILSON of Washington. But they made only a certain appropriation, and required the Secretary of the Interior to bring the land offices within that appropriation.

Mr. McRAE. That is the point exactly. It has only succeeded in giving the settlers a great deal of inconvenience without any benefit whatever.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. And it is causing the Secretary of the Interior great inconvenience also without giving the settlers any benefit. Mr. CAMINETTI.

Mr. CAMINETTI. Mr. Speaker, one word. This does not direct the Secretary to act, but only to investigate, and then to act upon his thorough investigation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman?

Mr. COFFEEN. I desire to have the resolution again read. The resolution was again read Mr. COFFEEN. Do I understand that this applies to the State of California alone

Mr. COFFEEN. I wish we might have Wyoming included, for there are very important matters which need attention there in the same direction. I offer that as an amendment to the gentleman's resolution, to include the State of Wyoming.

Mr. SAYERS. Do not do that—
Mr. CAMINETTI. I would like to be kind to my fellow-members, but I think it would be better in this case to act independentl Mr. COFFEEN. I think the gentleman will not object when

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to considering this bill

Mr. COFFEEN. I will object until I have an opportunity to confer with the gentleman from California [Mr. CAMINETTI]. The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

PRINTING OF HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a House resolution pro-

The SPEARER and before the House a House resolution providing for the printing of hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means, with Senate amendments to the same.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The object of this amendment of the Senate is simply to give the Senate 2.000 copies of the hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means of the House in addition to the 2,000 copies which the resolution provided should be printed for the use of the House. I move to concur in the Senate amendments. the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were concurred in.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

The committees were called for reports, when bills of the following titles were severally reported, and, with the accompany ing reports, ordered to be printed and referred as hereafter stated:

CLERK OF UNITED STATES COURT, INDIAN TERRITORY.

By Mr. BAILEY: A bill (H. R. 4186) to regulate the fees of the clerk of the United States court for the Indian Territoryto the House Calendar.

NATURALIZATION LAWS.

By Mr. OATES: A bill (H. R. 3799) to amend the naturalization laws of the United States-to the House Calendar.

SECTION 1058, REVISED STATUTES.

By Mr. STOCKDALE (adversely): A bill (H. R. 3758) to amend section 1058 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the District of Columbia—ordered to lie on the table. Mr. LAYTON. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to make a favorable report on a bill, which report I am just preparing. I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to file the report with the Clerk during the day.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the gentleman will be permitted to hand in the report during the day.

AMENDMENT TO REVISED STATUTES, UNITED STATES.

Mr. LAYTON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 3981) to amend section 5391 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 339) to authorize the Chattanooga Western Railway Company to construct a bridge across the Tennessee River near Chattanooga; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This completes the call of standing committees for reports. The morning hour begins at eighteen minutes past 12. Without objection, the matter that was up on yester-terday from the Committee on Public Lands will be passed over until to-morrow, that committee not losing its right. Chair desires to confer with the Committee on Rules on the question presented, it being an important question of practice, and there seeming to be no precedent one way or another. Without objection that will go over, the committee not losing its right.

Mr. McRAE. I understand the committee is to be passed without losing its place on this call.

The SPEAKER. Oh, of course. It will be called to-morrow.

FEDERAL COURTS IN THE INDIAN TERRITORY.

The Committee on the Judiciary was called.

Mr. CULBERSON. I call up from the Committee on the Judiciary the bill (H. R. 140) to provide for a special judge of the the Federal court in the Indian Territory.

I call the attention of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES], who reported this bill, to the fact that the bill is on the Union Calendar. I yield the floor to the gentleman from Ala-

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill, which is on the Union Calendar.

The bill was read, as follows:

The bill was read, as follows:

That whenever the judge of the Federal court of the Indian Territory shall be disqualified to sit as said judge in the trial of any cause, or of any plea or proceeding therein on account of any interest in the subject-matter of the suit, or on account of being connected or having been connected with said suit, or other litigation or suits, involving the same subject-matter, in any way as an attorney at law therein, then, and in that event, it shall be the duty of the said judge, and he is hereby required to appoint, at the earliest practical time, a committee of three impartial attorneys at law in attendance upon said court, who shall forthwith choose some impartial and competent attorney at law to preside as special judge in the trial and proceedings of such cause, in lieu of the regular judge of said court, and said special judge shall have all the powers in such proceedings as exercised by the court in the trial of other such causes.

SEC. 2. That whenever the parties to any such suit may agree on an attorney at law to preside as such special judge as above provided they shall notify the court of such agreement, and the attorney so agreed upon shall preside in trial of said suit and all proceedings therein, instead of the regular judge of said court.

SEC. 3. That this act take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. It will take but a moment to dispose of it. It is on the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The SPEAKER. The Chair does not see how it got onto the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. DOCKERY. It makes no appropriation.
Mr. OATES. I do not think it ought to have gone to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. It involves no charge upon the Treasury? Mr. OATES. Not at all.

The SPEAKER. It seems to have been erroneously referred to the Union Calendar.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I would like to have the bill read again, as I did not catch the first section.

Mr. OATES. If the gentleman will be satisfied with a statement I wid tell him what it is in a moment.

The bill was again read.

Mr. OATES. The bill involves no charge upon the Treasury,

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. It seems to me, from the reading of the last section, it puts it in the power of the litigants to agree to try by some other person than the judge; and when that agreement is made, although the judge may be competent to preside, that discharges the judge and employs another one.

Mr. OATES. I would state to the gentleman that this bill was prepared by an attorney of the court, a former member of Congre s. and sent to me, and I introduced it. My friend from Texas [Mr. Bailey] is personally acquainted with the judge, who is a former law partner of his, and he has been in correspondence with him. He has a letter from the judge, suggesting an amendment to this bill, and stating that otherwise it meets his approval. It is an agreed case, will be made to meet the approval of the judge, and there is no objection from any

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Does that amendment, now suggested, substantially do away with the section to which I refer?
Mr. OATES. It is intended to relieve the judge when incompetent by reason of interest or relationship, and provides that the parties may agree upon some one instead of him, appointing a committee of attorneys, who shall select a special judge to sit in his stead.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Will you amend the bill in that particular?

Mr. OATES. I propose to hear the amendment of the gentleman from Texas, and I am going to yield him the floor for the purpose of offering the amendment.

Mr. DINGLEY. Before that is done, I would like to inquire, will not this attorney who is employed to act as judge receive some compensation?

Mr. OATES. There is no compensation provided for in the

Mr. DINGLEY. Will not that be a charge on the Treasury? Mr. OATES. No; there is no compensation provided for at all, and he can not receive any compensation unless you provide I will state to the gentleman from Maine that my experience at the bar is that where an attorney is agreed upon in a case where the judge is incompetent to preside in the case, I have never known one to make any charge for it at all.

Mr. Speaker, I yield the floor to the gentleman from Texas

[Mr. BAILEY]

Mr. DINGLEY. Would it not be well to insert a provision to make it certain that no compensation shall be paid?

Mr. OATES. Well, the parties interested there do not seem

The SPEAKER. The bill should properly be on the House Calendar, and will be considered in the House.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, the judge of the court, in a letter to me, commenting upon the bill, says this:

There is no provision in the bill for an election in case of the sickness of the judge or his relationship to the parties. It therefore seems to me that these last two should be made causes for disqualification, and should be provided for in the bill.

I have drawn an amendment covering the suggestion, but before offering it there occurs to me a very much more serious objection to the bill than that indicated in the judge's letter. The objection which occurs to my mind is this: That the bill provides for the election of a special judge. This special judge, after elected, the bill provides, shall be a judge of the United States court.

In other words, it constitutes him an officer of the United States. I submit to the gentlem in from Allabama that except in the manner provided in the Constitution there is no way in which a man can become an officer of the United States. There are three methods in which inferior officers of the United States may be created. It is provided that Congress may by law vest the appointment of interior officers of the United States in the President alone, or in the courts of law, or in the heads of a De-partment, and I submit to my friend from Alabama, that it is not competent for Congress to authorize three atto neys to elect an officer of the United States. Therefore it occurs to me that rather than attempt to amend the bill with that serious defect in it, the bill might be recommitted to the committee, and re-ported back with a provision that in all cases where the judge is disqualified he should certify that fact to the Attorney-General, who should be required to appoint a special judge, as under the Constitution he can be authorized to do.

Mr. OATES. In reply to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Bailey] I will say that the question he raises might be raised in the event that the gentleman selected or agreed upon to try a case outside of the regular course should undertake to inflict punishment for contempt of court. The question might be raised then as to his eligibility or as to his competency as a judge, he having been selected in this way. But as to his power to preside and try the case, no question of that kind could be raised, for the reason that even under State laws, where an agreement by the parties, or by the attorneys, selects a man to try a legal controversy his competency is recognized, and even the clerk of the court may in some cases select a member of the bar to preside and try a case.

Thus, even where the Constitution requires that judges shall be elected by the people, a trial presided over by a judge selected as this bill proposes is good, and his judgment is good on the principle of arbitration, unless one of the parties raises the question of his eligibility and litigates that. By this bill the judge is not empowered to elect or select a man to preside in his place. He is simply empowered to nominate three practicing attorneys of the court who may name a man to preside in place of the judge. I do not think it is necessary to recommit the bill on account of the technical question raised.

The bill is agreeable to the judge and to the attorneys out there, and there is no probability of any such question being raised there. If it were raised, I do not know what would be the decision. I know that where the Constitution prescribes a the decision. I know that where the Constitution prescribes a particular manner of election or of appointment, or where the law made in pursuance of the Constitution prescribes a particular manner of election or appointment, that is the method to be pursued. Now, this would be an act of Congress providing a means of selecting a judge other than that directed in the Constitution; but the selection in any case where the parties did not relieve to the principal of the principal control of the p not raise an objection to it certainly would be good on the principle of arbitration. If the question were raised by either of the parties and litigated, it might be that the Supreme Court would hold that the judge was not legally appointed.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state, in support of the suggestion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Balley], that in the State of Illinois the practice grew up at one time of the lawyers on either side of a case agreeing that a brother lawyer should sit in the judge's place and try the case and enter judgment. That practice prevailed for quite a con-siderable period, until it was brought to the attention of the supreme court of the State by another set of lawyers who came into the trial of a cause on appeal. They directed the attention of the court to this point and the court held that the judgment was void.

Mr. OATES. There was no statute providing for the selec-

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. There was no statute providing for it, but the order was entered and the judgment rendered by agreement of the parties on the arbitration theory of which the gentleman speaks, yet the supreme court of Illinois held that, under such conditions, the judgment was absolutely void.

Mr. OATES. Well, the supreme court of my State has held just the contrary, that a judgment in such a case is good on the principle of arbitration, and I do not see any reason for holding principle of arbitration, and I do not see any reason for holding the contrary doctrine.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Now, you put the supreme court of Alabama against the supreme court of Illinois. That shows that among good judges and good lawyers there is a difference of opinion upon this point, and while that difference exists it strikes me that this bill would be bad legislation. I think the idea of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] is far preferable, that where a case on the calendar of the court is called up in which the judge by reason of his relationship to one of the in which the judge, by reason of his relationship to one of the parties or for any other reason, is disqualified to try, he can so certify. Under our present law a district judge from any other State or from any other section of the Union can be sent into that Territory, and it seems to me that we ought not to go into the realm of speculation in a matter of so much importance as that which is involved in this bill.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, replying to my distinguished friend from Alabama [Mr. OATES], he will permit me to say that the power of Congress to pass this particular statute is the very question at issue here. I insist that Congress has no power to provide for the selection of an officer of the United States except in the way specified in the Constitution, and whenever it undertaken the constitution of the constitution of the constitution. in the way specified in the Constitution, and whenever it undertakes to provide for the appointment in a different way the statute itself is no law, the court so constituted would be no court, and the judgment rendered by it would be coram non judice, and would be no judgment at all. Replying further to the gentleman, he will permit me to say that the court in question has jurisdiction of certain crimes, and when a criminal is arraigned at the bar, the judge having been his counsel previously, he can plead that the special judge elected by these three attorneys has no power to try him; and thus the judge being disqualified by no power to try him; and thus, the judge being disqualified by this statute if it becomes a law, and the special judge having no power to try him, the criminal must go scot-free.

I submit that it would be quite as competent for Congress to authorize three persons to elect a postmaster as to authorize three lawyers to elect a judge. This bill affects a court presided over by a friend of mine, who was formerly my law partner, and I ought to state, in justice to myself, that it was presented to the House in my absence. Otherwise I would have made this suggestion to the committee. I have drawn an amendment in accordance with the suggestion contained in the judge's letter. cordance with the suggestion contained in the judge's letter, but the point seems to have escaped him, as it did my distinguished friend from Alabama. It is no reflection on either of them, because I know they are both excellent lawyers, and the most obvious point sometimes escapes the best lawyer. I submit to my friend from Alabama that the easiest and the best way out of the difficulty is to recommit the bill and let the committee report it back amended as I suggest.

Mr. OATES. I admit that in a criminal case the pointraised by the gentleman might be well made. The principle of arbitration holds good only in civil cases where the parties agree. Of course, there may be other important considerations in connection with this question. As I stated a while ago, I introduced this bill as it was sent to me, and as I understood it was acceptable to the judge and to the members of the bar. I knew nothing about the practice in that locality. The gentleman from Texas states that the judge, a former law partner of his, desires further investigation of the matter. I have no objection to that.

Mr. BAILEY. Move to recommit the bill, and then we can perfect it.

Mr. OATES. I am perfectly willing that the bill shall be recommitted for further examination.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the bill will be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

REGISTRY OF VESSELS, ETC.

Mr. MALLORY (when the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce was called). I call up the bill (H. R. 101) to amend section 4131 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. The bill was read, as follows:

The Dill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4131 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to read as follows:

"Sec. 4131. Vessels registered pursuant to law, and no others, except such as shall be duly qualified, according to law, for carrying on the coasting trade and fisheries, or one of them, shall be deemed vessels of the United States, and entitled to the benefits and privileges appertaining to such vessels; but they shall not enjoy the same longer than they shall continue to be wholly owned by citizens and to be commanded by actitzen of the United States. And officers of vessels of the United States, including engineers and assistant engineers of all steam vessels, shall in all cases be citizens of the United States."

Mr. MALLORY. I ask that the report be read. The report (by Mr. MALLORY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to whom was re-perred the bill (H. R. 101) entitled "A bill to amend section 4131 of the Revised tatutes of the United States," having carefully considered the same, re-pectfully report and recommend the passage of said bill, with the following nendment: After the words "United States," in line 18 of the bill, insert the following.

After the words "United States," in this too, with the volume of the Words, however, That in cases where on a foreign voyage, or on a voyage from an Atlantic to a Pacific port of the United States, any such vessel is, for any reason, deprived of the services of an officer below the grade of master, his place, or a vacancy caused by the promotion of another officer to such place, may be supplied by a person not a citizen of the United States until the first return of such vessel to its home port; and such vessel shall not be liable to any penalty or penal tax for such employment of an alien officer."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment just read as a part of the report of the committee.

Mr. MALLORY. I ask the Clerk to read a letter on this subet from the Supervising Inspector-General.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF SUPERVISING INSPECTOR-GENERAL OF STEAM VISSELS,
Washington, D. C., September 22, 183.

Washington, D. C., September 22, 1833.

Sin: I have the honor to return herewith copy of bill 101, House of Representatives, to amend section 4131, Revised Statutes, referred to this office. "for report upon the portion of the within bill relating to engineers and assistant engineers."

The amendment referred to is found in the following words: "including engineers and assistant engineers of all steam vessels, shall in all cases be citizens of the United States," to be added to section 4431 Revised Statutes, as such section read before it was amended by the act of Congress approved June 25, 1884, "An act to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marines and encourage the American foreign carrying trade;" which latter amendment would be repealed should H. R. bill 101 become law, which amendment itself is held by many persons as accomplishing all that is sought to be obtained in the proposed bill, namely, recognition of licensed engineers of steam vessels as "officers" of such vessels.

There can be no question, I think, that under the laws authorizing the licensing of officers of steam vessels, sections 4438 to 4452, Revised Statutes, engineers are classed, by implication at least, as officers of steam vessels, as much so as are the master, mate, and pilot, referred to in above sections, all of whom in the aggregate are referred to therein as officers, without distinction as to the particular position assigned to each. Inasmuch, however, as it is understood an appeal is to te made to the courts to construct the meaning of the existing amendment to section 4131, Revised Statutes, regarding its application to engineers as officers of steam vessels, it would seem to the Supervising Inspector-General that it would be better not to change the existing amendment until the courts shall have rendered a decision upon the subject, when it is possible such decision will obviate the necessity for a change. Should the decision be adverse, this office would advocate the change proposed in the bill now under consideration.

The copy of bill is returned herewith.

Very respectfully,

JAS. A. DUMONT, Supervising Inspector-General.

The Hon. SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. Speaker, the object of this bill is to require that engineers and assistant engineers of vessels in the merchant marine of this country shall be citizens of the United

Mr. DINGLEY. In other words, you propose to include in the list of officers engineers who have not heretofore been included. As the law now stands, simply captains and mates are recognized as officers:

Mr. MALLORY. The provisions of the Revised Statutes is Officers of vessels of the United States shall in all cases be citizens of the United States.

Since that provision of the Revised Statutes was enacted, there Since that provision of the tevised Statutes was enacted, there has been legislation on this subject in the act of June 24, 1884, alluded to in the letter of the Supervising Inspector-General. But last year the Secretary of the Treasury, in the case of the two steamers City of Paris and City of New York, ruled that this section of the Revised Statutes which I have just read did not apply to engineers

Mr. DINGLEY. That is, that the word "officers" did not

Mr. MALLORY. Yes, sir; and since that time, as I understand, the Treasury Department has adhered to that ruling. The result is that although for many years past it has been considered as the rule that engineers, like masters and mates, should be citizens of the United States, the door is now open to foreigners of all countries to come here and serve as engineers. The amendment proposed by the committee simply adopts the language of the act of 1884. The provision of that act is as follows: guage of the act of 1884. The provision of that act is as follows: All the officers of vessels of the United States shall be citizens of the United States except that, in cases where on a foreign voyage, or on a voyage from an Atlantic to a Pacific port of the United States, any such vessel is, for any reason, deprived of the services of an officer below the grade of master, his place, or a vacancy caused by the promotion of another officer to such place, may be supplied by a person not a citizen of the United States until the first return of such vessel to its home port; and such vessel shall not be liable to any penalty or penal tax for such employment of an alien officer.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that if it is considered by the House

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that if it is considered by the House desirable that engineers of our merchant-marine service should be citizens of the United States this bill is necessary.

Mr. LOUD. If the gentleman will permit I would like to move an amendment striking out the word "home", and inserting the word "American" before the word "port".

Mr. DINGLEY. It would be better to have the bill read "port of the United States" rather than "American port".

Mr. MALLORY. I am perfectly willing to accept that.

Mr. DINGLEY. This bill, as originally introduced, was evidently copied from the Revised Statutes, forgetting the provisions of the act of 1884, and the proposed amendment is simply to place these of 1884, and the proposed amendment is simply to place these officers on the same footing with the statute as it exists to-day in regard to other officers. What is done by the exists to-day in regard to other officers. What is done by the bill is to include simply in the list of officers of American vessels who must be citizens the engineers.

Mr. MALLORY. And assistants.

Mr. DINGLEY. Up to the present time it has been held by the Department that captains and mates only were the officers withing the meanin of the law. But now, in consequence of the trouble arising with the steamships Paris and New York, where the engineers were foreigners—

Mr. MALLORY. And still are.

Mr. DINGLEY (continuing). And the law did not except them. The intent of this bill is simply to include the engineers in the category with other officers of our vessels who must be citizens, and I think they ought to be included.

Mr. MALLORY. The assistant engineers are also included.

Mr. DINGLEY. Well, I do not know as to that.

Mr. MALLORY. They render the same service as the chief engineers.

Mr. DINGLEY. However, I do not think there would be any difficulty about that. It will be remembered that when the City of Paris and City of New York came under the American flag the old engineers, who had been on the vessels when under the British flag, being so thoroughly acquainted with the vessels, it was not thought advisable to make any change for the time being. But as I understand it the assistant engineers were time being. But as I understand it the assistant engineers were appointed—the new men—as American citizens. But I think sufficient time has elapsed for this to apply, so that I do not see

Mr. MALLORY. I ask a vote on the amendment as modified. The fiPEAKER. The Clerk will report the modification.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 23, page 2, strike out the words "its home port," and insert "any port of the United States."

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engressed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.
On motion of Mr. MALLORY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. Cousins, on account of important business.

LIFE-SAVING STATION, MORRIS ISLAND, SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. BRAWLEY, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, called up for consideration the bill (H. R. 9) to transfer the Morris Island life-saving station, near Charleston, S. C., to Sullivans Island.

The SPEAKER. This bill is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. BRAWLEY. It is on the House Calendar.
The SPEAKER. That is true; but the bill should be on the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, inasmuch as it involves an expenditure

Mr. BRAWLEY. I ask to consider it in the House as in committee.
Mr. SAYERS.

Mr. SAYERS. Let it go to the committee.
Mr. BRAWLEY. Then I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union (Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee in the chair).

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to transfer the Morris Island life-saving station, near Charleston, S. C., to Sullivans Island, and for this purpose he may either cause the present station buildings to be removed to a sultable site on Sullivans Island, or new buildings to be erected thereon, as shall appear for the best interests of the Government.

Mr. BRAWLEY. I ask for the reading of the report, which will explain the object of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Report (to accompany H. R. 9).

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9) totransfer the Morris Island life-saving station near Charleston, S. C., to Sullivans Island, report the same back to the House without amendment, and with the recommendation that the bill do pass. The transfer proposed in the bill is, in the judgment of the committee, not merely desirable, but absolutely necessary. The letter of Hon. S. I. Kimball, General Superintendent of Life-Saving Service, dated September 19, 1893, and addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury, which is made a part of this report, indicates this necessity in detail.

The letter of the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, dated September 19, 1893, and addressed to this committee, which is made a part of this report, indicates his concurrence in the views of Mr. Kimball.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY, Washington, D. C., September 19, 1893.

Washington, D. C., September 19, 1893.

SIE: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the communication of the 13th instant, referring to me a copy of bill H. R. 9, entitled "A bill to transfer the Morris Island life-saving station, near Charleston, S. C., to Sulivans Island," and requesting information as to the cost of the proposed change and suggestions touching the merits of the bill.

In reply I would respectfully state that the matter was referred to the general superintendent of the Life-Saving Service for his consideration, and I transmit herewith his report with my concurrence.

C. S. HAMLIN, Acting Secretary.

Hon. GEo. D. WISE, Chairman Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, House of Representatives.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE GENERAL SUPERINTENDENT LIFE-SAVING SERVICE, Washington, D. C., September 19, 1893.

OFFICE OF THE GENERAL SUPERINTENDENT LIFE-SAVING SERVICE,

Washington, D. C., September 13, 1893.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the reference of bill H. R. 9, "to transfer the Morris Island life-saving station, near Charleston, S. C., to sullivans Island," forwarded by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, House of Representatives, for information as to the cost of the proposed change, and such suggestions as may seem proper touching the merits of the bill and the propriety of its passage.

The station referred to was built in the early part of 1885, and its location at that time was considered the best that could be selected. Vessels bound into and out of Charleston Harbor then had to pass through the main chancel (see inclosed chart), and were much more liable to strand or meet with accident in the neighborhood of Morris Island than near any other place where a station could be located.

Recent harbor improvements, however, have virtually obliterated this passage and the swash channel (see chart) has been dredged out and buoyed and become the great thoroughfare for the commerce of the port. This renders Morris Island almost valueless as a location for the life-saving station, and makes its transfer to Sullivans Island a necessity. I think this will be apparent upon a merc examination of the chart.

Moreover, in the fail and winter of 1891, an epidemic of malarial fever attacked Morris Island which prostrated every member of the station crew, save the keeper (who does not perform patrol duty), in consequence of which the patrol of the beach, a requisite of vital importance, had to be abandoned. The locality still continues to be unhealthy. A sanitary examinatiom of the premises has been made by the Marine Hospital Service, resulting in a report that little can be done to improve the condition of the place except by a system of drainage which would be impracticable on account of the expense it would involve.

In reference to the inquiry of the committee as to the cost of the change, proposed I would say that some inquiry has been made as to the expense are moval of the present building to Sullivans Island would involve, but no such careful examination has been had as would enable me to give an estimate in detail. The keeper of the station, who is a very intelligent mad, reports as follows: "Crouch Brothers, who have done considerable work for the United States Engineer Department, and are prominent contractors for marine work and wharf building, are of the opinion that the removal of the old station would cost more than a new one." The former civil engineer of this service, upon a casual view of the situation, has also expressed a like opinion. To erect suitable buildings for a new station at Sullivans Island would probably require between $6,000 and $6,000. In this connection I would mention that the village of Moultrieville has aiready donnated to the Government very desirable premises for the site of a new station.

Respectfully yours,

S. I. KIMBALL,

S. I. KIMBALL, General Superintendent.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

Mr. BRAWLEY. I apprehend there is no objection to the il. I move that the committee rise and report it favorably to bill. I mo

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9) to transfer the Morris Island life-saving station, near Charleston, S. C., to Sullivans Island, had directed him to report the same to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and

On motion of Mr. BRAWLEY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

THE BANKRUPTCY BILL.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the special

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 139) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

Mr. OATES. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of this bill.

The motion was agreed to. The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. OUTHWAITE in the chair.

Mr. DENSON. Mr. Chairman, this bill we have now under consideration is one of very far-reaching force and effect. It is one, sir, that reaches all of the interests of this country of a financial or property character. There is no telling—no proper estimate can be placed on the great power that can be exercised under the bill to retard and impair and to oppress the business interests of the country; and the great question we are to determine, whatever may be the constitutional power of Congress to enact such a law, is whether or not it is wise at this time, and under the circums and conditions surrounding our people, to exercise that constitutional authority.

The science of statesmanship, in great part, consists in the establishment of such institutions of government, the inauguration of such systems of political economy, the enactment of such laws, and the administration of the whole governmental authority in a manner and at a time as will agree with the conditions, the necessities, and the wants of a people—that will advance their interests promote their welfare, and, above all, generate and secure their contentment and happiness as individuals and develop and engage all the patriotism of good and law-abiding

Laws in the abstract are not always calculated or capable of promoting the general welfare, producing individual contentment, developing the affections of a people towards government, or maintaining the peace, good order, and strength of society.

No law of a procrustean nature can be defended upon any principle of just and wise statesmanship.

Laws must of necessity be of a concrete application, enacted and enforced with regard to the peculiar condition and needs of those upon whom they are to operate.

It is a dogma that overthrows in numerous instances all principles of justice and equity to assert that" the greatest good to the greatest number" should be an infallible rule to guide the begislative mind.

Upon this misleading dogma is predicated that meddlesome interference of Government with the pursuits, the energies, the genius, the ladustry, and results of human activities, that in the end leads to confusion, depression, and stagnation in all the enterprises and engagements of human energies.

The truth of this statement is made manifest and verified by the fact that the great part of legislative enactments of the preent day is amending, repea ing, and undoing some enactmentand some procedure of a former Legislature.

Paternalism in government is a growing incentive and ruling stimulus in a great part of public administration.

Governmental control, legislative direction, and administrative protection have so entrenched themselves in the American mind as to arouse the anxiety and so icitude of the thoughtul and patriotic citizen with forebodings for the simplicity, purity. and perpetuity of our free and democratic institutions.

To such an extent has this doctrine of governmental intriger ence and paternalism been carried that many whose affections have been reverently engaged in behalf of the simple and independent manhood generated by our republican institutions and the personal freedom and exemptions from official control, born of democratic systems, have resorted to the same methods and same procedure in governmental control and administration as a means of protecting their own personal interests and as a method of vindicating their own self-defense.

This is fundamentally wrong and hostile to all democratic principle and procedure.

Simply because Congress may have the unquestioned constltutional power to enact laws upon a given subject is not, within itself, sufficient to justify legislative action.

If this is not true then it would have been wiser, more economical and efficacious to secure public tranquillity, the contentment and good order of the citizen and quiet of different localities. that all the provisions of the Constitution conferring power upon Congress should have been self-executing

Wise laws, and such as promote the public welfare, secure the general good, and advance the individual happiness, must always be suggested by the wants, needs, and condition of the community.

If the circumstances surrounding and controlling society will not vindicate legislative enactments as wise, beneficent, and necessary, then their justification can not be defended and supported simply because there is power in Congress to enact such

Mr. OATES. I agree with my friend entirely up to that point. Now the question is whether a bankruptcy law is or is not nec

Mr. DENSON. I shall annihilate that idea, Mr. Chairman, in a few moments. [Laughter.] I say that with the profound-est respect for my very special friend and colleague.

The true principles of free government, and of Democratic doctrines, are that each and all men shall engage all their faculties, employ all their energies, and pursue their happiness, and enjoy all the fruits of such engagements and pursuits, limited only by the restriction that he shall prosecute his engagements, employments, and pursue his happiness in such manner as not to infringe upon another engaged in like employments and pursuits.

Congress has the express authority conferred upon it by the Constitution to enact a bankrupt law, and to establish all the means and instrumentalities having regard to its constitutional power that its wisdom may suggest as necessary to carry such law into operation.

But the question is, is it wise, is it good statesmanship for Congress to exercise such constitutional authority at this par-

For a correct solution of this proposition we must ascertain the wants, needs, and conditions, as well as all the circumstances surrounding all our people of every business and locality.

Although we may discover that the greatest number may be benefited by such a law, yet we must go further and investigate if the enactment of such a law may not be more detrimental to the minority than good will result to the majority from it. Because of the natural surroundings, climatic influences, local differences, opposing interests, and conflicting pursuits and in-dustries differentiating our people and their business necessi-ties, this Federal Government of ours should be administered in such a spirit of compromise toward all our varied and varying interests, pursuits, and local differences that the principles of eternal and everlasting justice and humane precepts may be meted out, surround, and be enjoyed by each and every individual. I maintain if, after making the investigation into the conditions and surroundings of the people in each of the localities of our broad and expansive country, it shall be ascertained that greater and more serious detriment will accrue to the minority because of such enactment as will overbalance the beneficial results that will be gained by the majority, then good statesmanship suggests that such law should not be enacted and such constituThe question is, are the majority better prepared and abler to suffer the temporary losses and only submit to present incon-veniences that result to them because of the absence of such laws than the minority are to bear the ills and endure the hardships that may accrue to them because of the existence of such

If the solution of the question is that the majority are so situated, then justice and equity demand of the lawmaking power that it withhold the exercise of its power and refrain from the enactment of such laws.

We must remember in this instance, if we refuse to enact this bankrupt law we do not take away any right the creditor has or any procedure he had in contemplation at the time he entered into the contract with the debtor, by which he would secure and collect his claim.

We take nothing away from him; the State tribunals are still open to him with all necessary machinery to secure his debt. If he is vigilant and does not sleep over his interests there is more protection and security to him in the State tribunals than in the federal bankrupt court.

This statement is authorized and made manifest by the experience and action of the past, in repealing each and every bankrupt law Congress has ever enacted, and allowing them to exist but a short duration, because the ends proposed to be reached, the purposes desired to be subserved, and all expecta-tions hoped to be realized were thwarted and never materialized.

This Government has existed near a hundred and twenty years, and during all this long period we have had three bankrupt laws, and the aggregate time of the existence of all three has been only fourteen years. And I state here, none of them was enacted by a Democratic Congress or approved by a Democratic President.

Mr. OATES. Is it not time for us to begin?

Mr. LANE. Not to begin that kind of work!

Mr. DENSON. I think not under the present surroundings, as my speech will demonstrate.

Mr. OATES. If I had been a member of Congress I should have recorded my vote against each of the laws which the gentleman has mentioned, according to my understanding of them after examining them. This bill now under consideration does not contain the provisions which made those laws odious, and is infinitely superior to any of them

Mr. DENSON. I have no doubt my friend desires to do good to this whole country, and my experience and acquaintance with him for thirty years has convinced me that his desire has ever been to do right, and that his heart is in the right place, excepting only whatever criticism may attach upon this bill. I am satisfied that the gentleman is actuated by the highest principles of statesmanship and a desire to do good to our whole country.

There has never been any advocacy of such a law from any organized Democratic lawmaking power. Each and all the Federal bankrupt laws that have existed in this country were enacted by a political party that partook of the doctrines more or less of Alexander Hamilton's views of government.

The first bankruptcy law was passed in 1800. That was approved by John Adams. It was repealed in two or three years. The next law we had was passed in 1841, I believe, and approved by John Tyler, who was elected by the Whigs and who went astray, as the Whigs said, on the vetoing of the national-bank law. The next bankruptcy law was enacted by a Republican Congress and approved by Andrew Johnson, who was elected by the Republicans, but who deserted them and claimed to be a Democrat. That is the history of the passage of bankruptcy laws from a party standpoint.

The parliamentary history of our country shows that bankrupt laws have ever been matters of distrust and dissatisfaction to the Democratic party, and when found on the statute book have been repealed from the force of sentiment generated by Democratic criticism and opposition.

From these historical facts, if there were no other objections

From these historical facts, if there were no other objections to the bill, I would, as a Democrat, pause and hesitate a long time before I would give my assent to any bankrupt law.

From the history and tenets of the Democratic party and from our parliam intary history the inference is clear and the logical and natural conclusion is true that the thought and experience of the past condemns all bankrupt legislation by Congress, and that State tribunals and procedure are more conservative of the public good and beneficial to individual interests.

There is no impairment of the rights of the creditor and nother

There is no impairment of the rights of the creditor, and nothing is denied him, by refusing to enact this bill into law that the experience of the past recommends for his interest and advantage; but, on the contrary, such experience and trials of the past condemn as injurious to him and deleterious to the general good the enactment of a bankrupt law.

There has been a concensus of opinion upon this proposition by the Republican and Democratic parties. The bankruptcy law 1867 was repealed at the instance and suggestion of President Grant in a message, and after able argument made by both Democratic and Republican members insisting upon repeal.

Bankrupt laws are practically a part of the commercial law and are not adapted to or needed in an agricultural country.

The fact that such laws have existed and are now in existence in England, affords no reason or justification to place such a law upon the American people. The conditions, pursuits, and industries of the English people are very different from us.

The territory of the British Isles is exceedingly smaller than these United States, there are no such climatic influences and natural aspects, nor conflicting interests and pursuits as to differentiate their people and place their industries in conflict with each other.

The welfare of one locality, the good of one individual, promotes the welfare of every other locality and advances the good of every other individual. They are one compact body of people and justice can be carried to each man's door. They are a munufacturing and commercial people, so much so as to be called an island of shopkeepers, traders, and money-lenders.

What agricultural interests are pursued are food productions that are diversified and bring in returns at different periods during the same year.

They do not deal on an annual period of credit, but comparatively a cash system is practiced in dealing with the agriculturists. Hence the debtor class are not the farmers.

Their bankrupt laws operate neither directly or remotely upon the agriculturists to any very great extent, but they reach and affect almost solely the commercial interests, and from this fact the idea is indelibly impressed upon English jurisprudence that all bankrupt proceedings are a part of the commercial law.

I will turn now and speak alone as to the condition, needs, and wants of my own immediate constituency.

Ninety per cent of the activities and energies of my constituents is employed in the field of agriculture. They are farmers, cotton farmers—a class that is sui generis in the domain of agri-

No agricultural pursuit, no avocation in the domain of agriculture, has anything akin to or like the business of cotton farming. The advancement of machinery can never benefit a cotton farmer, because it is beyond the domain of the inventive genius of man to provide a system and a means by which cotton can be chopped out and picked. It has got to be done by hand. The cotton farmer's condition, his needs, his wants, his mode of employing his energies, his system of farming, the products of his fields, and the time and frequency of the returns he receives for his labor is different from that of any other agriculturist or farmer in all our expansive and boundless territory.

It takes him twelve months to make a crop. He gets but one return. If that is not sufficient to pay his debts—the cost of production—that is a final loss to him of a whole year's labor. "One by moonlight," as suggested by my friend from Texas. I believe in June, July, and August that you can work pretty well in Texas upon the plains. I know that it is light enough to read by moonlight, and I suppose my friend read by moonlight in that country.

It requires the constant and diligent labor of the twelve months to raise, gather, and market a cotton crop. He gets but one return a year for his products, and if the price is unremunerative then he can not recover that loss, but has to submit to it and make another crop, a year's time, to meet the demands the preceding year placed on him. He is a debtor and must have credit to make his crop. He requires this credit in the beginning of the year, and can not meet and liquidate such debt until he makes and markets his cotton, which is the end of the year.

This credit is extended to him by the local merchant in the larger country towns, and the small dealers in the immediate community. It is to such farmers the merchants and dealers aforementioned sell the most of their goods, and with whom they have the most of their transactions.

The bulk of the property of my constituents prior to and during the war consisted of slaves, who were emancipated by the results of the war.

This species of property composed the earnings of our ancestors from prior to the establishment of the Federal Government down to the day of emancipation.

The devistations, losses, and ruins of war came with and continued after emancipation. Society was disorganized, there was an upheaval of all social foundations, labor was destroyed, immense private debts hung over the people, and there was no circulating medium leftamong them with which to commence the upbuilding of fortunes and the readjustment of domestic affairs. The taxgatherer, however, continued his regular rounds, and what few landed estates that were left were in the main swept away, for the scalawags and carpetbaggers came, as the lice and other pestilential scourges of Egypt, and pounced down on the body politic and bankrupted every individual and every public and private corporation and enterprise in the land, disturbing society, and brought distrust and discontent to all liberty-loving citizens.

Concomitant with these baneful misfortunes came revolution and changes in public administration and juridical systems and authority.

The bankrupt law of 1867, and the demonetization of silver in 1873, followed in the lamentable train of direful evils just mentioned. A fall in the price of all agricultural products, with-out a corresponding fall in the price of the necessaries of life, and a decline in the price of labor, took place, and owing to un-equal and unjust financial legislation, and especially the assault made upon silver, my constituency are frightfully poor, and in-volved in merciless debt.

I will state to my colleague that I am now commencing with my argument to meet the question he so appropriately propounded to me.

These debts are due mostly to the local merchants and secured by mortgages upon the homesteads of the debtors, and notes waiving all exemptions of personal property subject to payment of debts.

Thus it is at once discovered that my constituency are at the mercy of the creditor, his home is in peril, and the personal effects necessary to secure a livelihood are jeopardized.

I admit that the farmer, the agriculturist, and the wage-earner are not embraced in the involuntary clause of this bill, but this does not relieve them from its baneful effects. They are in a painful degree subjected to its merciless ravages, and the defenseless victims of an expensive, and in my district, of an alien and partisan court.

They being the debtors of the local merchants, who are subject to the provisions of this bill, their homes and personal effects will be at once exposed to forced sale, amid the dearth, stringency, and contraction of money, the medium of exchange, and standard of value.

Let us consider the condition of the local merchant. He is and has been subject to the operation of all the legislation aforementioned, and to the results of that hellish visitation of the carpetbagger that plundered the public treasury, destroyed private substance, and leached his dishonest and gluttonous fangs into all that was of pecuniary value in our land; and what he could not carry with him in his ignoble flight he befouled it with his harpy-like touch, and made it useless and unprofitable.

The local merchants had for their customers the farmers, who, as before shown, commenced to fail in ability to pay, yet with increasing necessity for goods and for credit. The merchant was his personal friend, maybe his old army comrade; if not, a catholic philanthropy that should actuate every noble soul incited him, and as a matter of human kindness he continued to advance necessaries to the oppressed farmers and laborers, until he found himself embarrassed and unable to go further. He secured his claims by waive notes and mortgages on the homesteads of the farmers.

Having a sympathy with his fellow-citizen and fellow-man in his misfortunes, he has extended the time of the payment of the notes and mortgages due him from the farmers, looking forward to the near future when the Democratic party would come into the control and administration of the Federal Government, and the financial system and practices of the Republican party would be overturned, and the same rehabilitated so as to meet the necessities of the farmers and laborers, the sons of toil, and that cessities of the farmers and laborers, the sons of folf, and that silver would be restored as a money metal along with gold, as provided in our Constitution, and as practiced by our Democratic fathers and leaders for sixty years prior to the war, when they had control of the Government; that is so forcibly and perspicuously set forth in the last Democratic platform, so faithfully promised by each and every candidate for office, all public speakers, and Democratic journals in the land.

One of the clauses of that Democratic platform is to stop the "hammer of the sheriff" on the mortgages of the people. That has been ridiculed by the Republican press, and here we have, coming here and originated in a Democratic House, from a Democratic source, a bill inaugurating the crucial performance of the sheriff's hammer, with silver demonetized and destroyed.

Mr. PATTERSON. Does my friend deliberately tell this House that the policy of the Administration will demonetize silver and eliminate silver from the circulation of the country?

Mr. DENSON. Yes; most solemply.
Mr. PATTERSON. You say that is true?
Mr. DENSON. You will have to hunt some Cassandra. That is an enigma with the Democrats. The White House has not determined what it wants. It has declined one proposition. Mr. PATTERSON. I put the question to my friend, do you now tell the country and tell this House that it is the object and purpose of the Administration, of those Democrats who are supporting the Administration, to eliminate silver from our cir-

Mr. DENSON. As an humble citizen, as an humble member of this House, according to my own conscientious judgment, formed upon the facts presented, I say: Yes. Is that distinct and plain enough for you? [Loud applause on the Democratic

Mr. PATTERSON. I have nodoubt in my own mind but what the purchasing clause of the Sherman act will be unconditionally repealed, ultimately.

Mr. DENSON. Why?

Mr. PATTERSON (continuing). And I predict now, that if it is, that not one dollar of the silver of this country will be eliminated from our circulation, but it will be retained in our circulation, and retained on a posity with gold. Mr. PENCE. But there will be none added.
Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman from Alabama permit me?
Mr. DENSON. Certainly.

Mr. BLAND. Certainly.
Mr. DENSON. Certainly.
Mr. BLAND. It remains in circulation like greenbacks, to be
Mr. BLAND. It remains in circulation like greenbacks, to be

Mr. BLAND. It remains in circulation like greenbacks, to be redeemed in gold. It is virtually, as money, demonetized, and the gentleman from Tennessee can not deny it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PATTERSON. Well, then, I understand my friend from Missouri to admit that notwithstanding the purchasing clause of the Sherman act may be unconditionally repealed, that our volume of silver circulation will remain just as it is, the money of the people.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I do not admit any such thing. The bill that demonetizes silver, called the repeal bill, goes further than that. It reënacts the provision of the Sherman law that all the silver shall be redeemed in gold. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Several MEMBERS. Yes, that is it.

Mr. PATTERSON. I do not so understand; but I do admit that it is the policy of the Administration to retain every dollar of silver now in circulation on a parity with gold.

Mr. BLAND. It proposes to retain the greenbacks in the same way, by redeeming them in gold. You simply make silver the same as greenbacks, instead of making it standard money, and if that is not demonetization I do not know what it is. [Ap-

If that is not demonstration I do not know what it is. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DENSON. Now, Mr. Chairman, my friends have had a little family quarrel; and I just ask my amiable friend from Tennessee a question. Do you not know that the Wilson act is a direct rescript of the Sherman bill, introduced in the Senate in the last Congress, to repeal merely the purchasing clause of the bill, and you a Democrat voting for a Republican measure?

Mr. PATTERSON. Oh!

Mr. DENSON. I will read it, and I will submit it to the intelligence and information of this House. But I have got the

Mr. DENSON. I will read it, and I will submit it to the intelligence and information of this House. But I have got the bill there in my desk. You here, as a Democrat, professing to stand upon the Democratic platform, voting for a Republican measure to repeal the purchasing clause of the Sherman law! There are the two bills; take them and read them; and the only difference is that the Sherman law, introduced by Senator SHER-MAN, a Republican Senator, is far better for the welfare and the interest of the people than the Wilson bill. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. PATTERSON. I am doing another thing. I am voting for the repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman act, in pursuance of the declaration of the national Democratic platform. [Cries of "Oh!" on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BRYAN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama has the

Mr. DENSON. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr.

BRYAN Mr. BRYAN. I ask the gentleman to point to the plank in the Democratic platform which ever asked for the repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman act, and I ask him further, whether he is in favor of the repeal of the whole Sherman law

Mr. PENCE. Oh, that is cruelty! [Laughter.]
Mr. PATTERSON. My understanding of the Chicago platform is that it demands the repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman act. It does not use that language; it says the Sherman man law, but that has reference to the purchase of silver bullion and piling it up in the Treasury.

Every Democrat in this land knows that the thing that the Democratic party was attacking at Chicago was the purchase of silver bullion and piling it up in the Treasury of the United States. Now, I desire to say in this connection that I have never been and am not now in favor of the demonetization of silver, but I am willing to admit that it is by gold, by the gold roserve, that silver is maintained on a parity with gold. I say further-more, that the real issue before Congress now is this: Whether we are to have the single gold standard in this country or the single silver standard, and I maintain, and those who believe with me maintain, that if you continue the purchase of silver bullion and continue to pile it up in the Treasury as we have been doing for the past two or three years, it will ultimately break down the Treasury reserve and precipitate this country to the single silver standard. the single silver standard.

That is the opinion and the judgment of Democrats who be-lieve as I do, and our object is not to eliminate silver from the circulation of this country; our object is not to demonstize the silver we have got. Our object is to stop the purchase of silver bullion and to maintain the present standard of exchange, the present standard of value, and to hold our silver on a purity with that standard. That is the purpose and the object of the Democrats who believe as I do, and I do not want it to go out to the country that we are in favor of the destruction of the silver that we now have in circulation, because that is not our object

Mr. BLAND. Now, Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman whether he has not admitted everything I said, viz, that he wants to continue the gold standard in this country?

Mr. DENSON. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. PATTERSON. I want to reply to my friend from Mis-

Mr. DENSON. Mr. Charles Mr. PATTERSON. I want to reply to my friend from souri, who has asked that question.
Mr. DENSON. How pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity! [Laughter.]
That one word more, Mr. Chairman. I Mr. PATTERSON. Just one word more, Mr. Chairman. I want to say to my distinguished friend from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] that when the resumption act went into effect on the Ist of January, 1879, this country was on the gold standard, and it has been at the gold standard from that day to this, and the question which now confronts the country is whether or not we shall retain that standard, holding silver and Treasury notes and greenbacks on a parity with gold-whether we shall maintain that, or whether, under these conditions, the country shall be driven from that standard to the single silver standard.

Mr. BLAND. That is, you are opposed to bimetallism.
Mr. DENSON. Mr. Chairman, I think that in the month of August last my friend from Tennessee [Mr. PATTERSON] took an hour or more to have a crack at the silver question, but it seems that he is not satisfied with his effort on that occasion, and he comes here now in the ides of October and tries to inject and he comes here now in the dies of October and tries to inject a silver speech into a debate on a bankrupt law. [Laughter.] I am satisfied, sir, that every man who voted as he voted here upon that silver question will need more than sixty days to explain to his constituency the justice of that vote. I do not blame my friend from Tennessee for trying to inject speeches on every occasion in vindication of that Sherman repeal bill, and of his vote upon that act which so terribly murdered the financial wel-

Row, Mr. Chairman, I will resume the thread of my remarks. But alas! all these faithful promises to observe the former constitutional and Democratic attitude of silver have become as apples of Sodom, ashes upon our lips, and for those eager promises of relief upon which the honest farmer and sturdy laborer ises of relief upon which the honest farmer and sturdy laborer went to the ballot box and cast his vote and placed the Democratic party in complete control of this Government we are offered the Torrey bankrupt bill, the most crushing and damnable instrumentality to oppress the farmers, laborers, debtors, and small dealers of my section that the avarice, the greed, and the soulless cupidity of a Shylock could suggest.

Mr.OATES. My colleague does not charge that I have brought forward this bill in lieu of the other promises or pledges made to the party at the last national convention?

Mr. OATES. Because, as he knows, I reported this bill and advocated it long before the convention at Chicago met and adopted the last national platform. Mr. DENSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to make any charge against any member of this House in my remarks uny this bill, or in any other speech that I ever expect to make here. I acquit my colleague [Mr. OATES] of all partnership, of all connection with this bill outside of his legislative duty.

Mr. OATES. My legislative duty to all classes of honest peo-

Mr. DENSON. The Torrey bankrupt bill is the substitute offered for all the pledges and promises of financial relief and aid made to my people. I will not accept it for them, neither indeed will they accept it for themselves. [Applause.] Let us now examine some of the provisions of this bill. Strange, indeed, it is; a bill that would be more appropriately named to emasculate the energies and enterprise of the small merchants of the land, and confiscate their little property and the small remnant in the possession of the farmers and laborers, and collect the same at the expense of the unfortunate debtors and deliver it all over to the money power and the gold advocates of the country.

The Constitution, the Congress, and the courts must be employed post haste to speedily dispossess the unfortunates and dependents of the land of the little substance left from the burdensome and exhausting effects of unfair and unjust legislation, and with which they can at best and under most favorable conditions eke out only a scant and penurious living for themselves, their wives, and children, and yet retain their humble homes, and deliver it over under the form of cruel and harsh laws into the pos-session and ownership, at less than one-half its value, to the money class, the opulent, the haughty, the proud, the insolent, and unfeeling

If this bill becomes a law, it shall go into effect in six months, and then the cruel and excruciating process of wicked and in-solvent oppression of my unfortunate and helpless constituency will commence.

The humble homes and few acres of the honest, hard-working, the sturdy and patriotic farmers and laborers will be seized, the occupants dispos sessed and turned out homeless and defenseless upon the generosity of an already exhausted and depleted com-

As though inspired by the voracious and ravenous instincts of the stealthy and cunning jackal to kill and devour its crouching prey, the bill declares that all appeals shall be returnable in ten days to the appellate court, thus giving precedence to bankrupt proceedings over all other interests. Robberies and destruction of the public tre sury and public property may take place, citizens may be despoiled of their homes by the strong arm of the lawless, yet the public and individual interests must be set aside that the rapacious creditor may strip the carcass of an unfortunate debtor, and deprive unfortunate and helpless women and children of their homes and means of sustenance.

What fair valuation means must be determined of course by the debtor or the court. Here is room for the most wide and varied conclusions and most difficult of correct solution. A definition of this phrase has been perplexing to the judicial mind for years, as we are informed by decisions as to the value of land taken under the law of eminent domain. But in the phrase under this law it is even more difficult of solution.

Under the authorities as to value under the condemnatory proceedings of eminent domain the value is not considered as at a forced sale, but must be considered as a voluntary sale, and when one can extend time and make conditions so that the sale may be consummated as to yield the largest price possible to the seller.

Such construction can not be placed upon the phrase in this bill, the definition is not so liberal, it is more limited and cir-

A merchant or trader must meet his obligations within thirty See section 2a, subdivisions 2 and 6, page 5; subdivisions 9 and 10, page 6.

You see that question of insolvency comes upon every local dealer, every small merchant, in every aspect of his day's duty and of his day's business. He has to keep in his mind a constant and exact idea of what his property will sell for on that day, and for thirty days thereafter, in order that he may not be hurled into bankruptcy by some petitioning creditor, and God has never not made a min so crifted that he can'd make that certified yet made a man so gifted that he could make that estimate on each and every day with any degree of accuracy. There is no man who has been so gifted by God that he can make an estimate of this sort every day; it is a moral and mental impossi-bility. Yet gentlemen come here and in advocacy of the rights bility. Yet gentlemen come here and in advocacy of the rights of creditors seek to impose on the people of this country a bill with such clauses in it as that.

It is clear, then, that the "fair valuation" as used in the bill must unquestionably mean a cash sale, and at any time, whether the owner desires to sell or not, as the very bill itself calls for a daily value in view of certain conditions of the debtor.

If during any term of thirty days the liabilities of the debtor exceed his assets, on account of the depression in the money marexceed his assets, on accounter the depression in the dependent when the dearth of currency—even though his property may be worth 10 to 1 as compared with his liabilities—yet under this bankrupt law he can be put into bankruptcy. Why? Because bankrupt law he can be put into bankruptcy. Why? Because a 'fair valuation' means in this case a cash valuation.

I say there is in the bill an engine of oppression to which the most honest, the most prudent, the most careful citizen of this land, though he be gifted with sublime powers, almost approaching omnipotence, may be subjected to bankruptcy on account of his inability to meet the demands and exaction of this clause of

And the debtor must determine this matter in the first instance for himself, because the presumption of integrity, the presumption of honesty is as strong as the presumption of innocence. Suppose a man makes an error, makes it honestly; yet there is no equity, no flexibility in this statute. If a man makes a mistake and in view of the depressed condition of finances his property under this thirty-days provision will not meet his commercial obligation, he is hurled into bankruptcy, I do not care how honest he may be

To avoid being petitioned a bankrupt the debtor must always have property that he can realize on in thirty days, funds with which to discharge his obligations.

These clauses are inhibitions upon the business acumen, energy, and legitimate trading of the very shrewde stand most sagacious men in the country.

It will be discovered at once that too great and too oppressive power is placed in the hands of the creditor class, it puts the debtor and his property under the control of the creditor.

This is but another means, another instrumentality to be set on foot, in connection with the demonetization of silver, to put the property and personal liberty of the citizen under the con-trol and direction of the money and creditor classes.

It places all business of the country under the supervision of the wealthy, or those who have more or less capital.

The energies and capabilities of all the young and vigorous men and enterprising capacity are placed in a state of perilous and embarrassing condition.

Capacity without money must be banished from the commer cial world, or so embarrassed as to yield no commensurate profit. Mr. OATES. Although he is insolvent, still he may be restored by a discharge?

Mr. DENSON. Yes; provided he is insolvent under this idea of a "fair valuation."

Mr. OATES. But the gentleman admits that that would be a question to be decided by a court or a jury, if the defendant

Mr. DENSON. That is the ultimate decision; but I say that the debtor himself has got to pass upon that question, in view of his condition and circumstances. It is he who is to determine this question in the first place. Suppose he acts honestly, fairly, justly, desiring the equal interest of all his creditors, yet that does not save him from judgment. Action may still be taken against him. I say that, in this way, the presumption of honesty is overturned, trust in human integrity is destroyed.

Opportunities, unless backed by cash, must be declined, and the young and capacious must be dwarfed in all enterprise.

Honesty, credit, and capability must be circumscribed by the reflecting sheen of the gold dollar.

If the debter fails for thirty days to meet his commercial pa per, he is liable to be hurled into a bankrupt court, his property equestrated, all business arrangements overthrown, and all hopes blasted.

Suppose this bankrupt law had been in force from 1st of January last to the present hour, with this terrible, cruel, and destruc-tive panic upon the country, what would have been the result? The property of the debtors would have been thrust into the bankrupt courts, as not one of them could have paid his commercial obligations within thirty days, and no property could have been sold or hypothecated by which money could have been

If this bankrupt law had been in force during our recent financial condition numbers of these institutions under its provisions might have been put into bank-ruptoy.

Mr. OATES. My colleague will recognize the reason that the national banks are exempted from this law, that they are under another law of Congress; are completely subject to Congress.

sional power. Mr. DENSON.

I understand that; I am not making any spe-Mr. Daniel view of this.

Mr. OATES. And no corporation can obtain the benefit of this act as a voluntary bankrupt, but may be proceeded against as an involuntary bankrupt.

Mr. DENSON. Then if the local tribunals are sufficient—are all powerful to hold in check these gigantic institutions that stretch out their arms from the Atlantic to the Pacific, binding this country with iron bands—if the State tribunals are sufficient to control these corporations, then why, in the name of God, are they not competent to control these questions between debtor and creditor? The suggestion of the gentleman is an argument in favor of letting well enough alone—of adhering to our own domestic tribunals for the vindication of our rights.

Mr. CULBERSON. Will the gentleman allow me a suggestion?

Mr. DENSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CULBERSON. The effect of the provision which he is now discussing is to allow the banks to hold the money of the debtor, and to allow the creditor to put that debtor into bank.

ruptcy. [Laughter.]
Mr. OATES. I will ask my friend from Texas [Mr. Culber. Son], the Chairman of the Judiciary Committee, whether he ever proposed to include the national banks in the operation of this bill?

Mr. CULBERSON. This is a Republican measure, introduced by a Republican in a Republican Congress. When it was last considered I was not here. In the Fifty-first Congress I opposed it. And there was then no complaint that the national banks had ever closed their doors against their depositors, and refused a live their conditions the money by which they could now their to give their creditors the money by which they could pay their debts.

Mr. OATES. I wish to say in that connection that I, as well as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], opposed the bill in the Fifty-first Congress, spoke against it, and voted against it. This bill has been very largely changed since that time, and the objectionable features which it then had have been climinated from it. I have never heard yet that my friend from Texas proposes to subject the national banks to a bankruptcy law. My colleague [Mr. DENSON] supposes that other corporations are totally exempted from the bill. They are exempted only from the benefits of it. They can not become voluntary bankrupts.

Mr. CULBERSON. The gentleman knows that I have never been in favor of an involuntary provision in a bankruptcy law.

Mr. CULBERSON. The gentleman knows that I have never been in favor of an involuntary provision in a bankruptcy law.

Mr. OATES. I agree to that statement of the gentleman's position; but at the same time he has never proposed to subject national banks to the bankruptcy law.

Mr. CULBERSON. When you put the ordinary retail merchant of this country under the provisions of an involuntary bankruptcy law, and then permit the national banks who hold the merchant's coin to close their doors and refuse to pay his money out to him upon his check, and thereby compel him to turn his property over to be devoured by a set of officers in a turn his property over to be devoured by a set of officers in a bankruptcy court, it is manifestly unjust, oppressive, and wrong. Applause.

Mr. OATES. I wish to say in that conrection, if my friend wants to offer an amendment to this bill to subject national banks to its provisions, I will vote for it.

Mr. DENSON. Mr. Chairman, such conditions may come about at any time as the result of vicious financial legislation, and no debtor be at fault morally, legally, or from a business standand no debtor be attault morally, legally, or from a business standpoint, and yet because of the contraction of the currency and locking up depositors' money and refusing to honor their checks, temporary embarrassments overtake the debtor. There is no demand or sale of property and no money with which to buy it, and the debtor under such condition and the provisions of this bill could be petitioned into bankruptcy.

Mr. Chairman, I am very much pleased with that paragraph of my speech. From the remarks of my distinguished friend from Texas [Mr. Chairmson] and of my colleague from Als-of my speech. From the remarks of my distinguished friend from Texas [Mr. Culberson] and of my colleague from Alabama [Mr. Oates], I find them making the same argument, and I did not know that they had ever thought about it. It must be right.

Under the present conditions of the business of the country, the monetary embarrassments surrounding all, and the prospects that this state will not be relieved for sometime to come, no fair-minded and liberal-hearted creditor desires any such law as set forth in this bill.

Usurers, skinflints, and Shylocks alone are so merciless and unfeeling as to make any such demand, or ask for any such advantage over their fellow-men.

Under such circumstances I distrust the good faith and sincerity of any creditor who will make such exactions upon Con-

Again, to show what an unjust law it is, even in good times, and how cruel and selfish the creditor is, the bill requires the bankrupt to pay the attorney's fee for the petitioning credi-

Out of the estate. I wish to ask my colleague right there if the amount is not in effect deducted from the distributive share of the creditors?

Mr. DENSON. Suppose the bankrupt's estate was able to pay up all the debt excepting the costs and the lawyer's fees; he would lose that under the bill. I am trying to save for my unfortunate constituents every dollar that they can from the ravages of this iniquitous bill.

The CHARMAN. In the absence of objection and gentlemen and from Alabama will proceed.

There was no objection.

Mr. DENSON. I am very much obliged to the gentlemen and to the committee for its kind indulgence.

I was about calling your attention to section 2, subdivision 4, which absolutely forces all claims of exemptions to be tried in the bankrupt court.

In Alabama a debtor has got to file a statement of his liabilities and of his assets. Under the laws of Alabama a debtor desiring to claim the benefit of the exemption laws may at any time file his written declaration in the probate court asking such exemptions to be allowed him. Of course this amounts to a "written statement admitting his inability to pay his debts."

This law says that upon a written statement of the debtor as to his inability to pay his debt—that is the language of the bill—and if he makes any declaration of that kind on the records of

and if he makes any declaration of that kind on the records of the country or anywhere else, that is, that he is unable to pay his debts, he can be petitioned into bankruptcy.

According to the terms of this law, if the merchant or trader files such a declaration at once he can be petitioned into bankruptcy, and the bankrupt court, with its distant place of holding its session, and its expensive and costly procedure, at once seizes such exempt property or has a trial to determine the right and extent of the exemption. Court costs and witnesses fees attending a distant court will exhaust such small allowance.

Again the exemptions must be allotted as authorized by the laws of the State "wherein the adjudication is made." Section 5a, page 9, provides that—

This act shall not affect the allowance to bankrupts of the exemptions which are prescribed by the State laws in force at the time of the filing of the petition in the State wherein the adjudication is made.

Now, gentlemen, yeu will notice that we have here another serious objection to the bill which will work great detriment and hardship on the poor in this country. The exemptions must be allowed by the laws of the State where the adjudication is made

Then there is another clause to which I wish to call your attention.

Mr. OATES. Does my colleague contend that the costs and fees are to be paid out of the exempted property?

Mr. DENSON. No; of course not. I am speaking of the question of the allowance to the debtor of the exempted property, not by the court of his own State, but according to the provisions of this bill the exemptions made according to the laws of the State wherein the adjudiction is made. the State wherein the adjudication is made. Do you catch my idea? I anticipate my argument a little in this, but I want to explain this matter thoroughly as I go. If I, a citizen of Alabama, for instance, born, reared, educated, living there all my life, should be adjudged a bankrupt in New York, under the provisions of this bill I am compelled to claim only the exemptions which may be provided by the New York laws, and not those of Alabama

Mr. OATES. How could you be adjudged a bankrupt in New York?

Mr. DENSON. I will show you. I interjected that so you might eatch my idea. As I have said, it is a little in anticipation of my argument.

Now, suppose that New York requires that a man, before he shall be allowed exemption under the law, shall be a citizen or resident of New York. I can not claim it according to the laws of Alabama, because the bankruptcy law says the exemption must be allowed according to the laws of the State wherein the adjudication is made, and I can not claim exemptions under the laws of New York because I am not a citizen of New York.

Mr. OATES. But it says the exemption laws of the State where the bankrupt resides.

Mr. DENSON. No; my colleague is entirely mistaken. I have read the exact language.

Mr. OATES. That State which may be the residence of the bankrupt. Mr. DENSON. No. sir. Read on and see what exemption is

Mr. OATES. It must be in the State of the bankrupt's residence.

Mr. DENSON. It does not so provide.

Mr. OATES. But it does in another part of the bill.

Mr. DENSON. No, I have investigated it fully.

Authority and jurisdiction is conferred on a New York court, if I have done business there within six months of the time of the filing of the petition, and the New York court can adjudge me a bankrupt, according to the terms of this bill, and thus defeat the exemption law of the State of Alabama.

Section 17, subdivision 1, page 17, provides that the bankrupt court is invested with jurisdiction to edjudge persons bankrupt who have done business, resided, or had their domicile within their (the courts) respective territorial jurisdiction for the preceding six months, or the greater portion thereof.

These provisions utterly defeat the laws of exemptions, as the allowance must be made by the court according to the laws of the State "wherein the adjudication is made," and the adjudication can be made in any district wherein the bankrupt may have done business within preceding six months to the filing of the petition.

So the bankrupt may have his residence and be a citizen of a different State than the one wherein he did business. This bankrupt law, then, has the power either to destroy or impair the exemptions allowed by the States.

Since this bill is pressed so vigorously at such an unfavorable time, when financial distress and a money drought are prevailing throughout the land, and the provisions as to exemptions are set forth as in this bill, my suspicions are aroused as to whether or not there is not a settled determination of the creditor class to defeat all exemptions and grab all the debtor has, yet professing to secure all exemptions allowed by the States.

Mr. Chairman, I fear these gift-bearing Greeks; I am not impressed with the pious purposes of those creditors who offer these benevolences, yet have provided an ambuscade to defeat

The bankrupt law of 1867 allowed the bankrupt to claim his exemptions according to the laws of the State where the bankrupt was living at the time the bankrupt proceedings were com-menced. That language is plain. Why did they not use it in this bill? Why was it not inserted as an independent phrase or

Mr. OATES. If you wish to make the exchange and adopt that language in lieu of that used, I will accept it. That is what is aimed at.

Mr. DENSON. Mr. Chairman, with no disrespect to or criticism of my colleague, I wish to wash my hands of this infamy entirely and have nothing to do with it. [Applause.]

The exemption laws of the States secure these benefits alone to their citizens, and of course one could not claim an exemption in the State wherein the adjudication as a bankrupt is made unless he was a citizen of such State, although he may do or has done business in such State.

The bankrupt court determines all claims of exemption to be allowed the bankrupt. (Section 17, a, subdivision 9, page 18.)

The trustees set apart the bankrupt's exemptions and report the items and estimated value thereof to the court. (Section 47, line 24, subdivision 11, page 39.)

These provisions are unconstitutional, because the amounts in-

These provisions are unconstitutional, because the amounts involved are of more value than $20.

I repeat, that that provision giving authority to the bank-ruptcy court to settle these exemptions is unconstitutional, because it does not provide for a jury. The provisions of the bank-ruptcy law that set out the cases in which a jury may be had do not include the exemption laws. The people of my district, my unfortunate constituency, are tied hand and foot by this bill, as to their sacred rights of exemption and homestead, to the will of a judge who is allen to my people and not in sympathy with of a judge who is alien to my people and not in sympathy with

Now, the Federal Constitution says that in any case where the amount involved is over $20, the right of trial by jury is guaranteed in a Federal court to every American citizen. The exemptions in my State are over $20, and yet there is no provision in this bill for a jury trial. The laws of Alabama provide for a jury trial to estimate the value of these exemptions, but here the wight of the altiton is taken away the sleet to have the provision of the second control of the second the right of the citizen is taken away, the right to have his case tried by a jury of his peers is denied him, and is carried to a distant court and put in the hands of a one-man power, which is always an iniquity to an American citizen to whatever party he belongs.

I say you can not meet that argument by saying that a bankruptcy court is not subject to the proceedings of the common law. I know that the Constitution says "proceedings under the common law." The bankruptcy proceeding is a common law proceeding. Bankruptcy was known to the common law. The first English bankruptcy act was in the reign of Henry VIII, and that, under our decisions, is made a part of the common law, and, indeed, British statutes become common law in our coun-and, indeed, British statutes become common law in our country evendown to the reign of Queen Elizabeth, subsequent to the reign of King Henry VIII.

Subdivision B, section 8, of this bill, page 11, is a most oppressive and tyrannical law; if it is not unconstitutional it is clearly at war with the genius of our institutions and the spirit of American liberty. I wish to read to you that subdivision B section 8: B, section 8:

The judge may, at any time after the filing of a petition by or against a person and before the expiration of six months after he has been adjudged a bankrupt, upon amidavit of any party in interest that such bankrupt about to leave the district and that his departure will defeat the proceedings therein, issue a warrant to the marshal directing him to bring such bankrupt forthwith before the court; if upon hearing the evidence it shall appear to the judge that the allegations of such affidavit are true and that it is necessary, he shall order such marshal to keep such bankrupt in custody, but not imprison him, until he shall be released or give ball conditioned for his appearance, from time to time, as required by the court and for his obedience to all lawful orders.

I do not say it is unconstitutional, but it is verging so closely upon the line of the genius and the spirit of American liberty that I never will lend my vote to the enactment of any such law. It is impairing the liberties of the citizen, and not merely the personal liberty, the right to enjoy property, but the right of locomotion, to go anywhere he pleases, and engage in any business he sees fit and proper. Here, taking up the illustration, if he be judged a bankrupt in New York, he may be made to remain in New York during the whole pendency in the proceedings, and under the practice of Judge Busteed in Alabama, it may be ten years before he will be discharged, and in the mean time he would be compelled to stay there. For me, I would want to be with my family; and under such circumstances, having to remain away until a judge of a bankrupt would discharge me, when I got home I might find their hopes blasted, their expectations defeated, bankruptcy and ruin surrounding them in their old age. [Laughter.] I will never give, under any cir-cumstances, my advocacy and my vote to such an infraction or infringment of the liberty of locomotion or the personal liberty of the American citizen.

I do not say it is unconstitutional. You may perhaps justify it upon the common-law principle of the writ of necreat, but that does not meet this question. There you had to have a trial, and you could not imprison until there had been a flagrant violation of the performance of some duty. This proceeding is to take place within the territorial jurisdiction of the Federal court, their writs run throughout the United States. While you have to submit to the limit of their territorial jurisdiction of the district prescribed in the statute in the commencement of the suit, after jurisdiction takes place its writs run against parties throughout the United States.

Mr. OATES. Does my friend not know that the purposes of ne exect is simply to retain the party, so as to give his evidence, and prevent him from defeating a judicial proceeding on account of his absence? Mr. DENSON. I confess that, but it is a harsh means to procure such a beneficent end as assumed by the creditor class who You shall not depart from the kingdom of Great Britain, from the broad expanse of the British Isles; but that is preferable to the ne exeat initiated in this bill.

Mr. STOCKDALE. He is here in custody.
Mr. DENSON. Yes; he is in custody. Under ne exeat regno, in the language of the common law, I live in one particular district, the northern district of Alabama, and a man sues me in bankruptcy in the southern district, he can force me to reside in the southern district, because it says "within the district where the suit is commenced." That makes me reside in the southern district of my own State, where I do not want to reside. I want district of my own State, where I do not want to reside. I want to get away from the negro population and live among white folks. [Laughter.] Now, under that law they could force me to live there until the case is determined or give bond, notwith-standing that I have not any interest in the southern district, that all my interest and business, and all my business relative, that all my interest and business, and all my business relative, that all my interest and business, and all my business relative, that all my interest and business are in the northern district. Yet, under the express language of this bill, you can force me to remain in the southern district in the custody of the marshal, unless I am able to execute an appearance; if I could not secure such bond I would have to remain in custody in the southern district.

Mr. GOLDZIER. Does my friend mean to say that the man is compelled to permanently reside in the district until the case shall be determined, or does he not admit that he may be released on bond and make his appearance from time to time, so that during the time he is not wanted in the court he can reside anywhere

Mr. DENSON. No, sir; he has to remain in custody of the marshal, unless he execute a bond as above mentioned. would be the necessity for this provision if you give that right?

You can strike it out. I think you ought to do so.
Mr. GOLDZIER. I would like to hear the gentleman as to the portion of the bill where he considers that a man must after the portion of the bill where he considers that a man must after his arrest permanently remain within the district?

Mr. DENSON. "He shall be in the custody of the marshal."

What jurisdiction has the marshal of the northern district over a citizen of the southern district? But the marshal will release him if he can give bail, you say. Suppose he can not give bail; then he is to remain in the custody of the marshal, and you tell me that means constructive custody? No, sir; it means under the control and direction of the marshal every minute until he is released by the court. is released by the court.

Mr. BAILEY. A rich man would be in constructive custody.

Mr. DENSON. Undoubtedly, because small favors are always allowed them, they are able to use the palace car, champinge, and have gold dollars to pay the porters, but what would become of the poor man who had not even a little silver, and the whole power of the Government is invoked to deny it to him? [Laughter.] Now, I say this, that under this law it is a deprivation, without due process of law, of the liberty of the citizes. You need not incarcerate a man in jail to deprive him of his liberty, If I take my friend [Mr. CULBERSON] on the street and hold him by force it is false imprisonment and a deprivation of his liberty. I shall not vote for a bill of that class; never; no. never.
The boast of American institutions is that this is a country governed by laws and not by men. To deprive one of his liberty that is guaranteed by all State and Federal Constitutions it is not necessary that he should be incarcerated in a jail or prison house, but the least detention of one contrary to his will and without lawful authority is an invasion and infraction of the constitutional security of every citizen.

The right of locomotion, of changing situation, or moving one's person to whatsoever place one's own inclination may direct without imprisonment or restraint are the very essence of personal liberty.

Upon proof of the matters set forth in section 8, subdivision b, and the judge shall deem it necessary, he may order such bankrupt into the custody of the marshal, until he shall be released or give bond for his appearance.

This is too great a burden to personal liberty to be left to be imposed at the discretion of a judge.

A man's home may be in Massachusetts or New Jersey, and he may do business in New York, and under the power conferred under this section the bankrupt could not leave New York to visit his family, or commence business at his home or elsewhere, unless he could give an appearance bond. He can be tied up for an uncertain and indefinite time and prevented from using his energies and efforts to support himself, his family, or to repair his fortune.

This section puts too small a price upon personal liberty and makes it too cheap. I oppose the bill on this ground.

This deprivation of personal liberty takes place when no crime has been committed. It violates the soul and spirit of Magna The great writ of habbas corpus arose from conduct offensive than this, and yet the judges of England annulled the king's verbal order, and restored the drunken and blasphemous Jenks to liberty.

No appeal is given; forced to submit to what a judge may consider necessary without any statements as to what facts are essential to establish such necessity.

Indefinite and unlimited time, remanded to the custody of the marshal, and with no means prescribed to have the matter re-viewed by an appellate tribunal, or by any court of any kind whatever, the judge acts and his determination is final, and personal liberty is destroyed.

Under a statute allowing one to be imprisoned two years on the ground of habitual drunkenness, can not be sustained by a chamber order.—State v. Ryan, 70 Wis., 676.

And it there is any member from Wisconsin present, I refer to him to the decisions of the courts of his own State that such a chamber order was an infraction of the privileges and rights of the citizen, and that it was unconstitutional and void, no matter if the Legislature had said that the judge might issue it, because it was against the very genius of the constitutional provisions for the preservation of liberty.

Mr. Chairman, if this provision of the bill should become a law,

Mr. Chairman, it this provision of the one should become traw, liberty would be the cheapest and most valueless thing known in this country, even below the price of silver. [Laughter.] This provision of the statute can not be justified under the old writ of ne exeat regno sued out in courts of chancery. It appears creditors must be protected in their hopes, their expectations, and in their greed, even if personal liberty has to be trampled under foot and destroyed.

Poor and honest debtors must suffer, their enterprises, their hopes, and their expectations, their liberty and their freedom may be destroyed by legislative enactment, and there is no redress. It is a false idea that in this day and time it is an act of dress. It is a false flow that in this day and time to is an accordance to take everything a person has, especially the producer, farmer, and laborer, and turn them and their families houseless, homeless, and in penury upon the community, that in my section can with difficulty and most extreme frugality care

Mr. OATES. My colleague does not insist that any farmer would be subject to be adjudged a bankrupt otherwise than upon his own petition under this law. He only contends, I suppose, that it may affect the farmer because his property may be under mortgage or he may be in debt to the merchant.

Mr. DENSON. My colleague is correct. That is my argument. I do not say that the farmer is subject directly to this bankrupt law, but I do say that for the purpose of his destruction, for the annihilation of all his hopes, prospects, and expectations, it is just as effectual as if he were; I say that this law reaches him as effectually as if he was nominated in the bond itself, because he is the debtor of the local merchant who is to be thrown its to bankrupter under this law, and the court has to called the into bankruptcy under this law, and the court has to collect the assets of the local merchant, and those assets are the mortgages and the waive notes of my constituents.

There is no surplus for anyone for any purpose. Whatever is lost or taken away can not be supplied, as there

Poverty and misfortune, intensified by unfavorable financial and revenue legislation, must be made more excruciating by taking at once what little pittance is left. The liberal exemption laws of each State provide sufficiently and benignly for unfortunate debtors without the gift of a bankrupt bill from the creditors of the country.

These exemptions, however, are to be destroyed by costly and expensive litigation in a Federal court distant from the citizen's home, the payment of a large attorney's fee to protect it; to say nothing of the attorney's fee, the bill requires the bankrupt's estate to pay the creditor's lawyer for destroying that estate

The idea of a bankrupt law was suggested in some part by the cractice of continental Europe and the ancient common law allowing the creditor to imprison the debtor and in some jurisdictions sell the debtor into slavery to settle his debt. But hap-pily for the present there is no imprisonment for debt and no slavery, and each State has provided through its exemption laws perfect security for the honest debtor, and relieved him of all that depression, mental anxiety, and robbery of his family of the fruits of his labor, and fortified that paternal superintendence so eloquently referred to by Judge Story and laid down by him as the basis of the bankrupt law.

Judge Story's eloquence and reasons are beside the condition of things at present

To charge that the State laws and State institutions will not secure justice and equity to all is to doubt the integrity of the people and imply a want of capacity in the State for self-govern-

It carries suspicion as to any heartfelt interest in the debtor's welfare, when we reflect this bill is the embodiment of the views of the creditor class, and so much research, so much learning, so much eloquence is commanded by its advocates in behalf of the unfortunate debtor, whom they deprive of the last vestige of property and every means of support.

Bankrupt laws are justified by Hamilton and Story as an instrumentality in aid of commercial pursuits; and so the common law writers declare them a part of the commercial law, and it is not wise or expedient to apply them to an agricultural people either directly or remotely.

Statistics show that there are only 2½ per cent of failures among merchants and traders. This is a most infinitesimal minority, and certainly no appreciable injury can result to the people and business of the country from so small amount of failures. But to this small per cent of failures this bill proposes to add a majority of my constituents by the remote operations of this law, by sending its ravages to their homes, and deprive them of their houses, lands, and personal effects upon which to live.

Mr. OATES. My friend's assumption that this law would deprive his constituents of their homes and ruin them is not, of course, based upon the idea that they would come directly under its provisions, farmers and wage-earners not being subject to be put into bankruptcy, but only allowed to go into it voluntarily if they so desire. Therefore, the unfortunate results to them of which he speaks are to come by reason of the insolvency of the merchants.

Mr. DENSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. OATES. I understood my colleague to state a while ago that only a little over 2 per cent of the mercantile community fail

Mr. DENSON. Yes, sir. Mr. OATES. The last statement I noticed put it at 1.7 per Mr. OATES. The last statement I noticed put it at 1.7 per cent per annum. Now, is not prediction of the general ruin of the farmers and laborers which my colleague makes, based upon the hypothesis that all the merchants in his district and in his State may be put into bankruptcy under this law? And how does that hypothesis reconcile itself with the fact which he states, that only about 2½ per cent of the merchants fail?

Mr. DENSON. Mr. Chairman, unfortunately for my constituency 2½ per cent of the merchants ewn, by virtue of mortgages, all that they have got. [Laughter.]

all that they have got. [Laughter.]
Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, if I understand the gentleman's argument, it is this: That the silver legislation is the seed which was sown to produce this great crop of ruin, and this bankrupt bill follows as a harvester and thrasher to enable Shylock to bill follows as a narvester and thrasher to chante begather in his crop. [Laughter.]

Mr. DENSON. Yes, sir; I do say that.

Mr. OATES. Do you say that that is true when this bill, in one form or another, has been before the Congress and been considered for the past six years?

Mr. DENSON. I say again I do not want my colleague [Mr.

Mr. DENSON. I say again I do not want my colleague [Mr. OATES] to think that I am impugning him in any way. I exonerate him entirely. I know him too well not to know that he would never engage in the oppression of any man in Alabama or anywhere else.

Mr. OATES. I thank my colleague for the compliment, but if this bill has been before Congress and considered for the past six years, does it not follow that it has no part or lot with any recent measure of legislation?

Mr. DENSON. Mr. Chairman, twenty years ago silver was demonetized, and this financial legislation for the destruction of the laborer, the farmer, the producer of this country has been going on ever since 1865, when the last shot was fired on the battlefields of this country. I do not say that this is the only stage of it; the Wilson repeal bill, passed in this House, is the sum total of all the iniquities and crimes perpetrated against the people. While it is iniquitous and monstrous, other acts of legislation equally vicious lie behind it.

Ah, Mr. Chairman, this bankrupt bill is but another cruel and destructive instrumentality employed by the demon Money to crush out the farmers, the laborers, and the masses of the country, and make them subservient to and obedient slaves to the privileged classes-the capitalists and money power of this land.

I here raise my voice against this infernal engine of ruin, slavery, and destruction to the masses. I look upon it, in connection with the financial system now established and administered In this Union, as the last stroke necessary to destroy free institutions and drive home the last screw in the coffin of liberty.

A great revolution can not be successful and final until it has touched the proprietorship of land. No people ever lost their independence who owned their homes; a landowner was never known to become a slave or dependent so long as he could retain the unincumbered ownership and peaceable possession of his land.

William the Conqueror could not subjugate the Anglo-Saxon, he could not destroy English institutions and subdue the English spirit, until he had overturned English ownership of land and divided it among his retainers and followers.

So, too, in this country, popular liberty and free institutions will never be overturned so long as the brave and liberty-loving farmers, the patriotic landowners, and indomitable laborers own land and homes

This is well known to the banks, capitalists, and money owners; This is well known to the banks, capitalists, and money owners; these are the anglo-maniacs who are attempting every maniacs known to human ingenuity, human strategy, and voracity to secure the lands and homes of the masses, make them dependents, subject them to alien or distant landlordism, establish privileged classes, and usher in the pride, pomp, and glittering splendor of monarchial systems and procedure.

Mr. PATTERSON. Will the gentleman permit a question?
Mr. DENSON. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON. Do you attribute the misfortunes of your

Mr. PATTERSON. Do you attribute the misfortunes of your people to the currency legislation, or to unjust, unfair, onerous, oppressive, unequal taxation?

Mr. DENSON. To both, but more to the financial legislation. [Laughter and applause.] I want you to understand that I am opposed to the revenue-taxation system of this country, and also opposed to the revenue-taxation system of this country, and also to its financial legislation. I want you and the country to understand that from these fruitful sources of evil to my people have resulted their present condition. I want you and the country to understand that I attribute the large majority of the ruin that has come upon the people to the financial legislation of this country. [Applause.] I attribute it mainly to the demonetization of silver, cutting off the money supply of the people, that prices went down and the farmer could not get the productive cost of raising his cotton error when he had to make it or gradity cost of raising his cotton crop when he had to make it on credit at exorbitant and usurious rates of interest.

This voluptuous magnificence in part is to find a support upon the galled and overburdened shoulders, and tough and bruised hands of the farmers, laborers, and producers of this country.

Opulence always had a progeny of poverty and want that followed in its train.

Behind the scenes of regal splendor, affluent surroundings, and princely enjoyments, if not in the open retinue of indigents, may be found the victims of avarice and cupidity, the enthralled dependents of gain and oppression.

Ill fares the land to hastening ills a prey. Where wealth accumulates and men decay.

You have seriously impaired if not destroyed silver as money.

Contraction of the currency has been going on for years; the Contraction of the currency has been going on for years; the dearth of monsy, the representative of values, has become so pinching that all business is unprofitable, all industry is depressed, all prices and values so fallen and depressed that there is no demand for property. It will not bring half its value in open market, and with this painful and distressing condition of the people, it is proposed to put a bankrupt law on them; that through it, what little substance they have left, and upon which, if a little time is given them, with favorable financial legislation, they could soon pay the last pound of flesh, liquidate the last debt they could soon pay the last pound of flesh, liquidate the last debt with interest and save their homes, secure happiness and content to their families and preserve their freedom. Shall ft be swept away and go into the possession and ownership of the capitalist and meney classes, because they are the only persons who have money with which to buy at the public sales. [Applause.]

This bill provides, if it should become a law, that it shall go into effect within six months from the date of its passage.

Avarice and cupidity can not wait longer; flushed with a trimplant victure over the rights of the people in the destruction umphant victory over the rights of the people in the destruction of their constitutional money, guaranteed to them by the institutions, faith, and practices of our fathers, they come, ere the fervor of their exultations have died away from this Hall, and propose the procedure and tribunal by which letters of administration may be sued out upon the estates of living men, and the little remaining substance of the masses may be speedily brought under their control, and finally collected in their ravenous and under their centrol, and finally collected in their ravenous and insatiate maws. [Applause.]

Binding through their financial systems and the restrictions thrown around the use and coinage of silver as money the unfortunate and embarrassed, yet honest and patriotic producers, laborers, and farmers of this country tightly and helplessey, their purposes and ends, through the provisions of this bill, they propose with vulture instincts and wolverine appetites to gnaw out the very vitals of honest labor and provident toil. [Applause.] Ahl and all this nefarious work to be inaugurated and executed under the plac of relieving honest debtors.

plane.) An and all this negarious work to be inaugurated and executed under the plea of relieving honest debtors.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Who do not want it.

Mr. DENSON. Yes, sir. The devil never attempted to quote Scripture, but he made a bungling mess of it at last. There never was an act of tyranny, an invasion of constitutional liberty, but that it was committed in pretended solicitude for the honest masses of the common people. This is always the cry of the tyrange the water to propositivitional and targangical except the masses of the common people. rant, always the pretext for unconstitutional and tyvannical exactions made by creditors upon the suffering and helpless debtor class. That is the way government is overturned; that is the way tyranny takes its march over the free institutions of the

The vampire seeks its slumbering victim in the warm climate, and with its soft wings produces the cooling breeze and fans him to sound and refreshing sleep, and then thrusts its absorbent tongue into the veins and draws out the life blood until death ensues to the unsuspecting victim. So, too, this bill, vampireensues to the unsuspecting victim. So, too, this bill, vampirelike, allures the confiding as well as distrustful by proclaiming that the provisions of the bill are conservative of the honesty, the freedom, and relief of the oppressed debtor, and when it becomes a law, then Rhadamanthus, the judge of the Inferno, will hold his orgies, and the poor, the depressed, the unfortunate will be brought in myriads and offered up as a hecatomb to the rapacious exactions of avarice and cupidity. [Applause.]
In my speech, delivered on a former day of this session, upon the bill to repeal the Federal election laws, I attempted to point out the difference between the distinct and conflicting civilizations of the different sections of this Union, their conflicting and different industries and pursuits, and the two different and on-different industries and pursuits, and the two different and op-pesing methods of construing the Federal Constitution, and the two antagonistic and wholly dissimilar systems and administra-tion of this Government that arise from such construction of the

I assert now that the Hamiltonian, as distinct from the Jeffer sonian method of construing the Constitution, will inevitably lead to such impairment or downfall of free institutions as will bring in their stead the similitude of a monarchical system, with the callous hauteur and insolent bearing of a privileged class created by special favoritism in the administration of government and the execution of authority as its basis and moving

The least that can be hoped for, if this theory of government is to obtain, and free representative government displaced, will be an imperial republic, possibly after the order of the French system, with this difference, it will be our tendency to depart from the principles of free institutions, and our Government will become more despotic, as the tendency of France will be to advance towards free institutions it will become more liberal

The elements in our country to produce attrition and conflict are increasing daily by the influx of different nationalities with their different civilizations.

We do not now fully appreciate this, because there are not yet sufficient numbers. No race has ever produced a free representative government and one restricted by constitutional limitations protective of personal liberty and individual right except Anglo-Saxon. [Applause] Constitutional liberty regulated by law has never existed only among Anglo-Saxon people. This age of learning and advancement being as we might suppose almost the climax of human progress in the science of free government, gives no evidence there ever will be free representative government among any other people but the Anglo-Saxon. The passage of this bill, in my humble judgment, at this time will cause a change in the proprietary of the property to a great extent in the South and West. It will cease to be Southern and Western, it will become Eastern, English, and Scotch. Then will be distress and mourning in the land.

Mr. Chairman, the immediate irritating cause of our civil war was a conflict between the labor systems of the North and South. and slavery was the principal factor in that irritation.

Slavery was an ephemeral incident in the institutions of our country, and abolitionism was an ephemeral sentiment in the minds of men. Each will have another equivalent, though under another form.

The conditions that produced our recent sectional conflict exist now, and they will spend their force in other directions.

Varied climate, natural surroundings, and opposing interests will always tend to renew these contests in the parliament of Climate, natural aspects that surround us, and the legitimate incentive to take care of ourselves control men's thoughts and actions.

They are fretful sources of irritation, renewing and intensifying the attritions and contests attendant upon the competitions operating and energizing their powers under the influences of different natural and climatic surroundings and opposing in-

Free coinage of silver is now the equivalent of slavery; its demonetization and the single gold standard is the equivalent of abolitionism. [Applause.]

The demonstization of silver and the establishment of the single gold standard is the basis upon which the control of the labor and commercial systems and the industrial enterprises of this country is to be erected.

Destruction of silver as money is to enhance and augment the power and control of money, to insure the creditor class in its struggle for more wealth, and heartless exactions upon the labor and debtor classes of the land. [Applause.]

It is to make the masses subject to the privileged and money classes, to enthrone the money power and dethrone the people; to aggregate and secure the wealth of the country and its riches and affluence in the possession of a few, and produce a multifude in poverty and rage; to establish a ruling and privileged class supported and defended by wealth and the power of money, and thus lord it over the serving masses held in subjection by want, penury, and poverty, and unjust and oppressive legislation.

The bill under consideration is but one of the instrumentalities by which the downfall of the farmer and laborer of the South and West is to be secured, and to be made subjects to the contumely and insolence of money.

Mr. Chairman, the results of this bill upon the South and West is to change the proprietorship of the property of the two sections, shift it from the common masses and toiling millions, and invest it in the ownership, possession, and control of the money power.

That power knows the indebtedness of the two sections, it knows the depression in all prices and values, brought about by unjust and iniquitous financial legislation, superinduced by the demands of the money power. They know they can not rob the people of their heritage by force, but they propose to despoil and plunder them under the protection of law, and we see it now in the shape of this bankrupt bill. [Applause.]

Pæans are sung in praise of the honest debtor, condolence at the unfortunate condition of the debtor class is the potent manifestation of the advocates of this bill, by undergoests all these festation of the advocates of this bill, but underneath all these protestations is the hidden but keen knife of the Shylock to take both blood and flesh of these unfortunates whose condition he so much bewails.

The lachrymose expressions and manifestations have been too profusely set forth in the bill to produce any other belief in my mind but that there is a sinister motive behind it all.

It may be beautiful in its reliefs, composite in its designs, but it is filled with the elements of oppression and destruction to my people, and I will not support it. [Applause.]

my people, and I will not support it. [Applause.]
Mr. Chairman, legislative enactments, legislative remedies can not alter that condition of a people generated by aspect of natural surroundings, varied climate, and the different and opposing pursuits suggested by such natural surroundings.

They can not change that pursuit of intellectual achievement, and that trend of development evolved by natural laws.

and that trend of development evolved by natural laws.

Man owes not his advancement and progress to the aid or interference of government, but such are due to his intellectual energies and acquirements. Governmental interference has always impeded and retarded, or made unequal the results of human activities. Government, when administered within its legitimate and rational bounds, has but a small sphere in which to operate, save the enforcement of good order, and its police regulations.

Mr. BROOKSHIRE. Will the gentleman allow me a ques-

Mr. DENSON. Yes, sir.
Mr. BROOKSHIRE. Blackstone, I think, states in his Commentaries that governments are constituted for the purpose of securing to mankind personal liberty, personal security, and the rights of private property. You claim that this bill defeats those

Mr. DENSON. I do—that this bill by its operation, together with the workings of the financial legislation of the country, is calculated to have that result.

The true theory of progress and liberty is the maximum of human activity with the minimum of governmental control consistent with peace and good order. [Applause.]

While it is true slavery was the immediate cause of the war, yet the great causa causans like beyond and behind this, and must be attributed to the facts so hastily and cursorily meationed before.

And these great facts will find expression, and subjects to operate upon, in directions as different as the masterly force behind them may suggest.

As I said before, the direction given to these forces now is the money question.

The territorial plane upon which the contest is being waged is enlarged and extended, the numbers engaged are quadrupled and increasing, the cause more popular and nearer the hearts of the people, and the results involve the destiny of the human race.

Gold is the support of aristocracy and imperialism; silver is the defender of liberty and the maintenance of the masses. [Great applause.]

If the contest with the South by the North was made doubtful, what may we not expect when that South is allied in heartfelt smypathy as to ideas, and bound by the dictates of self-interest, with the dwellers in the Great Basin, those of the Pacific Slope, those with the Columbian Northwest? [Applause.] Estrangements subside when men mutually begin to inquire into the causes of each other's wants, distress, and suffering conditions and discover that there arises from like conditions and armoundings a bond of sympathy and self-interest, and the cause surroundings a bond of sympathy and self-interest, and the cause of such vicissitudes come from a common source.

Let there be no more conflict with arms; let the contest be waged in parliamentary halls; let it be based upon philosophic truths, devoid of all crimination, inspired by that patriotism and love of country, that devotion to truth for truth's sake that arouses those sublime and all-healing principles of eternal and everlasting justice to all, the only basis upon which our Union can be maintained, and that destiny of happiness intended for us by our fathers can be secured, when they laid deep in American institutions, and that has grown strong in the American heart, a leve of free institutions and devotion to constitutional liberty regulated by law. [Applause.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I have no intention of addresing the committee upon the merits of the pending measure. I have not been able to give it careful consideration, and could I have not been able to give it careful consideration, and could not, therefore, intelligently say anything either in favor or in criticism of it. My colleague [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE], however, on yesterday addressed the committee not only in condemnation of the bill now before the House, but also in condemnation of any system of bankruptcy at all; and in view of the fact that he represents a constituency which is identical in character with the constituency which I have the honor to represent, and in view of the further fact that I shall not be able to be present in the House when the vote on this bill is taken, it has occurred to me that it would be proper for me to suggest to the House to me that it would be proper for me to suggest to the House what my position with respect to the question of a bankruptcy law is. I have the honor to represent a constituency which is largely engaged in manufacture and in trade; and, in my opinion, some such measure as that now before the House is absolutely necessary to the commercial welfare of that people. Aside from the individual opinion which I have upon the subject, I have heard no word from my district against the enactment of a bank-ruptcy measure, while on the other hand I have heard many words in approval of it.

I am not entirely clear, but my recollection is, that when a bankruptcy bill was suggested in a prior Congress the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Pittsburg sent a memorial here in indersement of it. But, aside from the opinion that I entertain as to the interests of my immediate constituency and aside from the opinion that they entertain as to their interests, I am in favor of a bankruptcy bill upon other and higher grounds. I believe that it was the intention of the framers of the Constitution that a water of wallown have with a more than the constitution of the framers of the Constitution that a water of wallown have with a more than the constitution of the framers of the Constitution that a water of wallown have with the constitution of the framers of the Constitution of t tution that a system of uniform laws with respect to bankruptcy should constitute a permanent part of the Federal system. I regard the power granted in the Constitution to provide for "uniform laws with respect to bankruptey" as part of a harmonious scheme in which that power is interwoven with other powers granted under the Constitution, all of which were intended to be exercised and none of which were intended to be

I find in the Federalist that Mr. Madison, in commenting upon this particular clause of the Constitution, has grouped together a number of powers vested in the Federal Government by its organic law, as constituting by themselves a particular class, which he calls the third class, and which he enumerates as fol-

To regulate commerce among the several States and the Indian tribes; to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin; to provide for the punishment of counterfeiting the current coin and securities of the United States; to fix the standard of weights and measures; to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and uniform laws of bankfuptcy; to prescribe the manner in which the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of each State shall be proved, and the effect they shall have in other States; and to establish post-offices and post-roads.

I believe it was the intention of the framers of the Constitution in creating the Federal system that every one of these separate powers should be exercised, so as to make one harmonious whole, one Federal structure so to speak, of power; and I call attention to what Mr. Madison further says in connection with this subject:

The power of establishing uniform laws of bankruptcy is so intimately connected with the regulation of commerce and will prevent so many frauds where the parties or their property may lie or be removed to different States, that the expediency of it seems not likely to be drawn into question.

In my judgment the Congress of the United States has as much right to refuse to legislate with respect to the exercise of any of these enumerated powers as it has to refuse to legislate for the enforcement of a system of uniform bankruptcy throughout the country; and if that be true, then every citizen in the United States has a right under the Constitution of the United States to such benefits as shall accrue to him by the enactment of a uniform bankruptcy system; that is to say, every unfortunate debter in the United States has the right to the benefit of a wise bank-ruptcy law to his relief, and has a right to call on the Congress the United States to enact such a bankruptcy law to his relief, and every creditor, every business man in the United States who carries on business outside of his own State lines, and has debts incurred outside of his own particular State jurisdiction, has a right to invoke the Federal power to the protection and collection of his debts in accordance with a uniform law, and not be turned over to the separate individual and varying laws of forty-four different States.

And let me call the attention of the committee to some suggestions of wisdom on this subject in the direction I have indicated. I quote from a speech of Mr. Webster, in the Senate of the United States, on the 1st of April, 1849. He says, after arguing the question as to whether or not the States could pass bank-

ruptcy lawe:

The States, then, can not pass effectual bankrupt laws; that is, effectual for the discharge of the debtor. There is no doubt that most if not all the States would now pass such laws if they had the power, although their legislation would be various, interfering, and full of all the evils which the Constitution of the United States intended to provide against. But they have not the power: Congress, which has the power, does not exercise it. This is the peculiarity of our condition. The States would pass bankrupt laws, but they can not; we can, but we will not. And between this want of power in the States and want of will in Congress, unfortunate insolvents are left to hopeless bondage. There are probably one or two hundred thousand debtors, honest, sober, and industrious, who drag out lives useless to themselves, useless to their families, and useless to their country, for no reason but that they can not be legally discharged from debts in which misfortunes have involved them, and which there is no possibility of their ever paying. I repeat again that these cases have now been accumulating for a whole generation.

And so we may say now that such cases have been accumulating in our country since the repeal of the bankruptcy law of 1867, and no man can pick up to-day his newspaper and read the list of closing banks, of failing manufacturing establishments, and failing merchants and not have impressed on him the present necessity for the passage of some sort of bankruptcy law.

And Mr. Webster goes on to say, arguing in an extreme way, with respect to this acknowledged right of the citizen to be pro tected by the United States Constitution as to bankruptcy matters:

Sir, we talk much, and talk warmiy, of political liberty; and well we may, for it is among the chief of public blessings. But who can enjoy political liberty if he is deprived permanently of personal liberty and the exercise of his own industry and his own faculties? To those unfortunate tadiyidnals, doomed to the everlasting bondage of debt, what is it that we have free institutions of government? What is it that we have public and popular assemblies? What is even this Constitution itself to them inits actual operation, and as we now administer it? What is its aspect to them, but an aspect of stern, implacable severity; an aspect not only of austerity and rebuke, but, as they must think it, of plain injustice size, since it will not relieve them nor suffer others to give them relief. What love can they feel toward the Constitution of their country, which has taken the power of striking off their bonds from their own paternal State governments, and yet, inexorable to all the cries of justice and of mercy, holds it unexercised in its own fast and unrelenting grasp? They find themselves bondsmen, because we will not execute the commands of the Constitution; bondruen to debts they can not pay, and which all know they can not pay, and which take away the power of supporting themselves. Other slaves have masters charged with the duty of support and protection; but their masters neither clothe, nor feed, nor shelter: they only bind.

Every word so eloquently spoken by the great statesman from Every word so eloquently spoken by the great statesman from Massachusetts applies, Mr. Chairman, with equal force and elfect to-day, and calls on this Congress to enact in the interest of both creditors and debtors some sort of uniform bankruptcy

Now, sir, this bill may be defective; it may be defective in many particulars; it may be criminally cruel in some of its provisions, as has been suggested. I have nothing to say as to that. But we must enact some sort of measure or we will never have any wise bankrupt law upon our statute books at all. If, after this bill has gone through the Committee of the Whole and been subjected to debate and amendment on every paragraph, it should still present features to which I could not agree, I should feel inclined to vote for it as an opening to the passage of a law which, after going through both Houses and the committees of conference to its passage, and enjoying perhaps the experience of a year or two of practical tests, would finally eventuate in bill that would secure to all of the citizens of this country the benefits intended to be secured by this unused power given to us in the Constitution of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. RAY. Mr. Chairman, I regret that as a member of the Judiciary Committee I am compelled to criticise this measure in

Mr. RAY. Mr. Chairman, I regret that as a member of the Judiciary Committee I am compelled to criticise this measure in some of its provisions. I am in favor of a bankruptcy law, and I am in favor of a bankruptcy law which shall contain both voluntary and involuntary features; but I believe that it is the duty of this Congress, in the framing of such a law, which will necessarily affect all business men and indirectly all of our people, to give most careful consideration to the measure, and to see to it that it is not enacted into law until it has been perfected, so far as human wisdom in this Congress can perfect it.

Very wisely and justly the Constitution of the United States has vested in the Congress the exclusive power to make uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy. The States may pass insolvent laws, but to Congress exclusively belongs the power of making a uniform bankrupt law and providing uniformly for the release and discharge of creditors from their obligations. The States are forbidden to make any law impairing the obligation of a contract. Congress may provide by law that creditors shall be discharged from their debts and obligations when their property has been surrendered and applied to the payment of their creditors. And this law may be uniform throughout the whole length and breadth of the United States.

length and breadth of the United States.

Of course, a State may pass an insolvent law providing for the discharge of debtors under them in certain cases which will apply to all contracts made in the State, made and entered into subsequent to the enactment of such law; for the laws which exist at the time and place of making the contract enter into and form a part of it, and such contracts may embrace alike those State laws which affect its validity, construction, discharge, and enforcement.

The obligation of the contract is the law which binds the parties to perform the agreement. And as the parties contract with reference to existing laws, if a law is in existence providing for a discharge of the debtor without full payment, it is a part of the contract and applies to all contracts made while it is in force, but not to contracts made anterior to its passage.

But Congress may pass a law impairing the obligation of a contract and providing for the discharge of debtors from their debts in all cases, all those made by any citizen and before the enactment of the bankrupt law. Therefore, the powers of Congress are much broader, and reach much farther than the laws of any State can reach.

At three several times in our national history, the years 1800, 1841, and 1867, a bankrupt law was passed, approved, and put in operation, but each was unpopular and short lived for the reasons, among others, that it was too complex and the administration of estates too expensive. In the last law placed upon the statute book on this subject the attempt was made to so guard the estate against unjust claims that a majority of the estates administered upon were eaten up and wasted by the expense incurred in the complex red-tape proceedings necessary to be gone through with.

The same objection applied to the first law ever placed upon the statute book. If you will look at the debates in the United States Senate in 1824, you will find that Senator Tiswell said that he had been engaged in every bankruptcy case in his city, which was a seaport town, since the existence of the law; and that while many of the estates were large, not one penny as yet had ever reached the pockets of the creditors. The same objection was found in quite a degree to apply to all the laws we have had heretofore upon the statute books. In many cases the creditors received nothing, and in many other cases the dividends were so small that the creditors became disgusted with the whole proceeding, and in a few years there was an irresistible clamor for the repeal of the law.

In the present case the committee has exercised great care and has expended great labor in the effort to frame a law as free as possible from intricate proceedings, and has done its best to provide for the inexpensive administration of the estate of bankrupts. The efforts of the Committee on the Judiciary in three different Congresses have been directed to this end.

different Congresses have been directed to this end.

It is to be regretted that the members of the Judiciary Committee favorable to a bankrupt law have been unable to agree upon all the details of the bill. While nearly all favor a bankrupt bill, quite a number are opposed upon principle to any law on the subject containing provisions for involuntary bankruptcy. Such gentlemen insist that no man should be adjudged a bankrupt without his consent, and that the property of no man should be taken and applied to the payment of his debts pro rata without his consent.

It will be conceded that creditors should have the right to obtain judgment against their debtors, and enforce collection from the property of the debtor. Where this course is pursued, the one who first comes is first served, but the debtor has it in his power, by confessing judgment in the one case and by refusing in another, to give preference in judgments, and in addition to this, by means of mortgages and bills of sales, he may apply all his property to the payment of the favored few, while the many honest creditors are cheated of their honest dues.

I am in favor of a bankrupt law, and I am in favor of a law that shall provide for involuntary as well as voluntary bankruptcy in proper cases. Every man ought to have the right to surrender his property to his creditors, and have the same applied to the payment of his just debts, and then be discharged in all proper cases. While a few rogues will take advantage of such a law, the great mass of insolvents will be able to free themselves from their business entanglements and commence life anew, instead of being perpetually weighed down by a mass of debts, from which they can never hope to escape.

The greatest good to the greatest number will be effected by a wise bankrupt law. I am opposed to this bill as it stands, but, with a few amendments, its bad features can be so remedied that I shall be glad to give it my hearty support. I trust that gentlemen of this House will see to it that the objectionable features are eliminated before it is enacted into law. If these bad features, however, are not eliminated, then I hope no man in this House will give it his support. No bankrupt law should be so framed that any person can use it as a means of oppression. I have already caused to be inserted in the RECORD certain amendments to this bill which I shall offer at the proper time, and to these proposed changes I propose to direct my remarks.

Section 2 declares what acts shall constitute acts of bankruptey, and it provides that a person may be adjudged a bankrupt who shall within six months prior to the filing of a petition against him have concealed himself, departed or remained away from his place of business, residence, or domicile with intent to avoid service of a civil process and to defeat his creditors; (2) who shall have failed for thirty days while insolvent to secure the release of any property levied upon under process of law for $500 or over, or if such property is to be sold under such process then until three days before the time fixed for such sale and until a petition is filed; (3) made a transfer of any of his property with intent to defeat his creditors; (4) made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors or filed in court a written statement admitting his inability to pay his debts; (5) made while insolvent a contract, personally or by agent, for the purchase or sale of a commodity with intent not to receive or deliver the sume, but merely to receive or pay a difference between the contract and the market price thereof at a time subsequent to the making of such contract; (6) made while insolvent a transfer of any of his property, or suffered any of it to be taken or levied upon by process of law or otherwise for the purpose of giving a preference; (7) procured or suffered a judgment to be entered against himself with intent to defeat his creditors; (8) secreted any of his property to avoid its being levied upon under legal process against himself and to defeat his creditors; (9) suffered while insolvent an execution for $500 or over or a number of executions aggregating such amount against himself to be returned no property found unless the amount shown to be due by such executions shall be paid before a petition is filed; or (10) suspended and not resumed for thirty days and until a petition is filed while insolvent the payment of his commercial paper for or filed while insolvent the payment of his commercial paper for or aggregating $500 or over.

There is no saving clause, except in two or three cases, and any person who has committed any of these acts or who has suffered any of these occurrences may at any time within six months thereafter be adjudged a bankrupt, even though he has long before the filing of a petition against him repented and wholly cured the effects of the act defined and declared to be an act of bankruptey.

If a person at any time within the six months prior to the filing of a petition has concealed himself with intent to avoid the service of civil process and to defeat his creditors he may be adjudged a bankrupt and his property may be taken from him and administered in a court of bankruptcy even though he is at the time of the filing of the petition perfectly solvent, able to pay his debts, and even though he may have returned and surrendered himself to the process of the courts and paid the debt or claim from which he in the first instance fled.

Now, it was said by the gentleman having this bill in charge [Mr. Oates] yesterday, that this objection could be easily avoided, as no court would give to this act the construction I have placed upon it, and he also said that this language is substantially that used in the statutes of the various States where attachments are granted. I beg leave to differ with the gentleman. This morning I took occasion to examine the laws of all the States which grant attachments in certain cases, and I find that the language differs very much from the language used in this bill.

The amendment which I propose or shall propose provides that if upon the hearing on the petition filed it shall appear that before the filing thereof the person so concealing himself, or so departing and remaining away from his place of business, etc., has returned and submitted himself to the process of the court, and that no priority has been gained by any other creditor by reason of such absence, that then the petition, if based upon such act, shall be dismissed. It seems to me that this amendment is necessary, just, and proper. No person should be thrown into bankruptcy because he has committed an act of the nature described, if, before any action is taken, he has repented, and so placed himself and property that his credhas repented, and so placed himself and property that his creditors have suffered no loss.

It is no answer to this objection to say that the court would construe the law to mean that the concealment, departure, or remaining away must continue until the filing of the petition. In the first place no court or judge would ever give the act as here written any such construction. The very words of the bill forbid any such construction, and were intended to forbid any such construction. such construction. As drawn it reads:

Acts of bankruptcy by a person shall consist of his having within six months prior to the filing of a petition against him, I, concealed himself, teparted, or remained away from his place of business, residence or domi-cile with intent to avoid the service of civil process and to defeat his cred-

It is an act of bankruptcy if at any time within six months he has done any one of these acts. The time is six months, and each of the acts defined is couched in language of the past tense—referring to an act that has been done, not to one that is being done, or one not completed.

If the gentleman who has charge of this bill [Mr. OATES] speaks in good faith, why not use the words "conceals himself," departs, or remains away, etc., importing a present act or one not completed.

I refer to the laws of the State of New York providing for the issue of an attachment, and that act says:

If the defendant is either a foreign corporation, or not a resident of the State, or if he is a natural person and a resident of the State, if he has departed therefrom with intent to defraud his creditors, avoid service of a summons, or keep himself concealed, etc.

Using language imparting a present act and a continuing act, whereas this act declares that if the alleged bankrupt at any time within six months before the filing of the petition has done any of the acts specified then, upon petition of three persons, he may be adjudged a bankrupt. That is an infamous provision as it now stands in this bill, and it should be corrected; and I can say for one that I shall never vote for its enactment into law. In the second place, if, as he says, the court will construe the language in the bill to mean that the act must be a continuing one at the time a petition is filed, why not put it in the law and not leave it open to construction?

In enacting a law of so much consequence, one that will affect determined. In such litigations the attorneys will reap rich harvests, but it will be at the expense of suffering debtors and wronged creditors

Far better will it be to leave debtors to the mercy of their creditors under the State laws, and creditors to the remedies they now find in their local courts and laws. If we know what we mean let us say it plainly; let us use simple and straightforward language, and make the way so plain that the way faring man may walk in it and not go greatly astray.

I shall also insist that the law provide in its very terms for a dismissal of the proceeding in certain cases. The law proposed, as it stands, seems to contemplate that if a man has committed an act of bankruptcy, and a petition has been filed by the requisite number of creditors at any time within six months theresite number of creditors at any time within six months thereafter, that the offending debtor must go through bankruptey in any event; that his estate must be filtered through the bankruptcy machinery. And so far does this bill go that it forbids the alleged bankrupt the poor privilege of offering a composition until he has been examined in open court, or at a meeting of his creditors, and filed a schedule of his property and a list of his creditors. (See section 11, page 11.) Why not let him compromise at any time, if he can? Why expose to the whole world all his troubles, if he can satisfy all his creditors?

The amendments to be proposed also provide that if a petition has been filed the alleged bankrupt may have the petition dismissed by paying the claim of the petitioner with all legal costs incurred. It is eminently just and proper that a debtor should not be forced through a court of bankruptey at the instigation of a creditor when he is willing to pay and offers to pay the claim of the creditor instituting the proceeding.

The proposed amendments also provide that if a debtor has transferred property with intent to defeat his creditors that he shall not be forced through bankruptcy if the property so transferred has been restored to him in good faith before the filing of a petition. If a debtor has transferred property with the intent to defeat his creditors he should not be forced into bankruptcy if he has repented and reclaimed the property before any proceedings are instituted against him.

So in the case of property secreted, if it has been restored and subjected to a levy under the legal process of the court, or if the claim upon which the process was issued was paid before the filing of the petition, then the debtor ought not to be forced into bankruptcy. The door to repentance ought always to be open for repentant sinners, and if anyone sins against the law in such cases and repents and puts himself and property in statu quo before legal proceedings are instituted, the creditors should be content, and if after proceedings are instituted the debtor repents and subjects himself and property to the process of the court, or pays the claim to escape which he has offended, with costs, then the proceedings is handwarder ought to fail. the proceeding in bankruptcy ought to fail. And in all cases where a particular creditor offended against has been fully satisfied before another creditor institutes a proceeding, such other creditor ought not to be permitted to take advantage of the act which has been fully mended.

Section 2 provides that if a debtor fails for thirty days while section 2 provides that if a debtor falls for thirty days while insolvent to secure the release of any property levied upon under process of law for $500 or over, such act shall constitute an act of bankruptcy, and at any time within six months thereafter any creditor may file a petition against him: and it follows that upon showing such omission the debtor would be adjudicated a bankrupt even though he could show that before the filing of the petition he had secured the release of the property and had paid the debt upon which the process issued. the debt upon which the process issued.

This is the fair meaning and interpretation and the only interpretation that can be put upon this act as it now stands. This should be changed.

Mr. CULBERSON. Suppose he has become solvent in the meantime?

Mr. RAY. Certainly. That is in the line of my argument. If a man has committed any act of bankruptcy as defined in this bill at any time within six months prior to the filing of the petition, he can be forced through all the machinery of the bankruptcy court, even though he has since the commission of the act become perfectly solvent and able to resume business, and may be adjudged a bankrupt. That is an infamous provision as it now stands in this bill, and it should be corrected; and I can say for one that I shall never vote for its enactment into law. In the second place, if, as he says, the court will construct the language in the bill to mean that the act must be a sontinuing one at the time a petition is filed, why not put it in the law and not leave it open to construction?

In enacting a law of so much consequence, one that will affect so many of our business men, and which in fact will affect directly or indirectly almost every man in the land, we should be rectly or indirectly almost every man in the land, we should be rectly or indirectly almost every man in the land, we should be rectly or indirectly almost every man in the land, we should be rectly or indirectly almost every man in the land, we should be rectly or indirectly almost every man in the land, we should be rectly or indirectly almost every man in the land, we should be rectly or indirectly almost every man in the land, we should be rectly or indirectly almost every man in the land, we should be rectly or indirectly almost every man in the land, we should be rectly or indirectly almost every man in the land, we should be rectly or indirectly almost every man in the land, we should be rectly or indirectly almost every man in the land, we should be rectly or indirectly almost every man in the land, we should be rectly or indirectly almost every man in the land, we should be rectly or indirectly almost every man in the land, we should be inserted the words "and until the filing of a petition is filed," found in line 11, page 5, should apply to the fall-ure for thirty days to secure the release of property levied upon; but such is not the grammatical construction or reading of the rectly or indirectly almost every man in the land, we should be reserved the words "and until the filing of a petition is filed," found in line 11, page 5, should apply to the fall-ure for thirty days to secure the release of pr complished by inserting the words "and until the filing of a petition in bankruptcy" after the word "days," in line 7, and by striking out the words "and until a petition is filed," in line By the one amendment or the other it should be made cer tain that a debtor shall not be thrown into bankruptcy if before the filing of a petition in bankruptcy he has secured the release of the property levied upon under process of law, whether it is to be sold or not.

The fifth act of bankruptcy, as defined in section 2, is of very doubtful propriety. In effect it provides that a person who deals in futures and options shall be thrown into and forced through bankruptcy if he is at the time insolvent, while it leaves the door wide open for all persons who are solvent to engage in this kind of gambling. In other words, the solvent man may gamble in futures and options to enrich or impoverish himself and his creditors without being subjected to the penalty of being forced into bankruptcy, while the poor man who is carrying on the same business for the purpose, perchance, of bettering his condition and making money with which to pay his honest debts, may be thrown into and forced through bankruptcy as a penalty for resorting to this mode of making money with which to meet his honest obligations.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Do you think it would be fair or right for a man who has not enough property to pay his debts to use his small means in speculating on the board of trade rather than in paying his debts?

Mr.RAY. I will come to that question directly. What I am about to say will deal with that proposition. This discrimination is unwise as well as unjust. If the insolvent may not imperil the property he has by engaging in such transactions because it would tend to defeat his creditors, surely the solvent man should not be permitted to imperil his property and consequently his creditors by engaging in precisely the same transactions or business. It is no more improper for the insolvent than for the solvent man to engage in the business of gambling in options and futures.

Such a transaction endangers the creditors of the insolvent no more than it endangers the creditors of the solvent person. Congress should not enact a law which permits gambling by the solvent but forbids it by the insolvent. The truth is that the solvent but forbids it by the insolvent. whole provision has no place in a bankrupt law, and if we provide against this kind of gambling in this bill, then we should provide against all kinds of gambling, and insert a provision that any person who plays a game of chance for money may be adjudged a bankrupt at any time within six months thereafter. it more wicked or dangerous to creditors for a person to risk his money in a chance deal on options and futures than it is to risk it in a game of cards at the gaming table or at a horse race?

Mr. HICKS. How would you reach a man who has the inclination to deal in options.

Mr. RAY. I would not reach dealers in futures and options through a bankrupt law. If the gentleman will permit me, I will answer his question as I proceed in the regular course of my argument. This provision can not be defended except on the theory that a person who contracts to purchase or sell proporty with intent not to actually receive or deliver the same, but only to receive or pay the difference between the contract and market price at some future time, enters into a contract which may create a debt against him to the injury of his creditors, while he adds nothing to the actual property within his control or which might be made subject to levy and sale on an execution. By such dealings it will be acknowledged many men have been enriched, while hundreds of others have been impoverished. But if we make one act which endangers a man's estate an act of bankruptcy, then let us make all acts which endanger a man's estate acts of bankruptcy. If we apply this rule to commodities, why not apply it to all stocks and shares in railroad and other corporations, and apply it to the solvent as well as to the insolvent persons who operate in this way?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Then that provision ought to be widened and extended, in the gentleman's opinion?

Mr. RAY. I think it has no place whatever in a bankrupt law, but if it is to be here, let the provision take in all kinds of gambiers when they are caught at it. That would be, perhaps, an effective way of stopping gambling among the rich in the large cities. But if we make one act which endangers a man's estate an act large cities.

Mr. WOLVERTON. How can a man be a bankrupt who can pay his obligations?

Mr. RAY. Well, he might be unwilling to pay them. might flee from the process of the court. He might conceal or dispose of his property fraudulently.

Mr. WOLVERTON. But if he is willing?

Mr. RAY. If he is willing, and if he has property to pay all his debts, he ought not to be declared a bankrupt, especially if he can raise the money to meet his obligations as they fall due. In such a case he is not an insolvent person. But bankruptcy implies a status which is fixed upon the individual by law. Insolvency is simply a condition where a man either has not or can not command, the money to meet his obligations. A man may be insolvent without being a bankrupt; he may be a bank rupt without being insolvent.

Mr. WOLVERTON. Then you could not extend this bank rupt law to the rich gambler, because he can pay his obligations. Being solvent, he could not be declared a bankrupt.

Mr. RAY. I do not know about that. You say the "rich gambler." Now, we might confine it, under the principle of this bill, to the insolvent gambler; but this bill is not confined to in-I can see no justice, as I have already said, in making any distinction between gamblers. I see no justice in applying this law only to the man who is insolvent at the time he gambles. any distinction between who is insolvent at the time megamore, this law only to the man who is insolvent at the time megamore, because he does not endanger his creditors much, if any, more than does the rich man or the well-to-do man who risks his money in large sums at the gaming table. The latter may become in large sums at the gaming table. The latter may be come in the gampling at any minute. Every time ha in large sums at the gaming table. The latter may become in-solvent through his gambling at any minute. Every time he engages in a gambling operation he endangers his creditors, and if the one is to be forbidden to engage in that business, then the other ought to be, because both, though perhaps not in an exactly equal degree, endanger their creditors.

Or is it a provision intended to protect those who run this kind of business, and enable them to swoop down, like the hawk upon a chicken, the moment they have embarrassed a victim and force him into bankruptcy and come in and share in his estate, and prevent his applying his property solely to the payment and perhaps full discharge of his honest nongambling debts?

I say, Mr. Chairman, that this provision was put into this bill for the purpose of benefiting the stock-jobbers of Wall street, New York, and in the other great cities of the country. It was put there with the idea that when the insolvent man came in, through the hope of gain, and indulged in such transactions, the men who had seduced him within the charmed circle might turn around and swoop down upon him like the eagle upon its prey. Strike the gambling clause out of this bill. It has no place

The more one ponders upon this provision the more unjustand out of place does it appear. I am opposed to gambling of all descriptions, but I am not willing to single out this particular act of gambling and by law pronounce it more dangerous to the creditor class than are the other forms of gambling prevalent in this country. The man who places money on the gaming table and risks its loss on a chance game is much more a foe to his creditors and prejudices their rights to a greater degree than the one who speculates in wheat, corn, and other commodities by dealing in what are commonly called futures and options. us, if we retain this provision at all, strike out the words, in line 16, "a commodity," and insert in place thereof the words "any property or thing in action;" and also, in line 15, strike out the words "any property or thing in action;" and also, in line 15, strike out the words "while insolvent;" and to the title of the bill let us add the words "and to prevent gambling and dealings in futures and options.

GOLDZIER. Does the gentleman hold that Congress would have a right to pass a law to prevent gambling?

Mr. RAY. If we have a right to pass this bill in its present form, then we have a right to pass a law such as the gentleman suggests.

Mr. GOLDZIER. I am with the gentleman as far as his pressured to a hour passing the state of the s ent point is concerned, but as to his suggestion about passing a law against gambling, I have doubts as to our power.

Mr. RAY. I do not think we have any right or power to pass have regulating gambling or preventing gambling or permitting gambling, and for that reason, as well as on the ground of the expediency of the provision, I shall ask to have this subdivision stricken out, not because I am in favor of gambling, but because believe in wise and proper and constitutional legislation-"a place for everything and everything in its place.

If we retain this provision (5), let us make the title of the bill read "A bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, and grant the exclusive privilege of gambling and dealing in futures and options to solvent persons." The title of a bill should express generally its objects and purposes Again, should it be possible for a creditor to throw his debtor into bankruptcy if he discovers that at some time during the preceding six months he has, while insolvent, contracted for the purchase or sale of a commodity with the intent not to receive or deliver the same but only to receive or pay a difference between the contract and market price of the same at a future day? Suppose the transaction has long been closed, the profit pocketed or the less made good, shall this constitute an act of bankruptcy of which a creditor may take advantage? Nothing of the kind, so far as I can ascertain, has appeared in our bankrupt laws heretofore, and I do not consider it proper to insert such a provision in this bill.

The further proviso which I suggest is "that no person shall be adjudged or declared a bankrupt except on the petition of a person directly affected or injured by the act alleged to constitute the act of bankruptcy."

In my judgment such a provision is absolutely essential if we would have a just law, one not open to abuse, one not capable of being prostituted and used for oppressive purposes. An act done to defeat creditors, if not fully atoned for and remedied before a petition is filed, does directly affect and injure all creditors. Therefore the proviso will not interfere with any creditor when the act alleged was done with that purpose. And take a case where the debtor has failed to procure the release of property levied prop. then all creditors are injured for the taking erty levied upon, then all creditors are injured, for the taking and sale of the property will deprive other creditors of their just share of the assets, and so in nearly all the cases named in the

But take the case of an insolvent person who has a note in the bank with a good indorser for $500 or over. For some good reason the bank is unwilling to renew and the debtor has not the son the bank is unwriting to renew and the dector has not the ready meney, and the indorser gets time or pays the note. The indorser is willing to wait, to give the debtor time, but Mr. Shylock, who has suffered no damage or injury by the transaction, steps in, and taking advantage of the circumstances, plunges the debtor into bankruptcy. This ought not to be permitted. If the indorser, or the bank, or other creditor holding the paper to willing to wait all graditors who are not injured about he is willing to wait, all creditors who are not injured should be willing and compelled to wait.

A petition in involuntary bankruptcy must be filed by three creditors, if the number of creditors are twelve or more, and may be in any case if their claims aggregate $500 or over, so that three creditors, one with a claim of $499 and two with claims of 50 cents each, can in any case throw a man into bankruptcy, and this regardless of the fact that none of the claims of the petitioners are due.

Mark that. It makes no difference whether the claims are due or to become due a month or six months hence. A man with a claim of $499 and two other men with claims of 50 cents each on open accounts can come in and throw the debtor into bankruptcy.

If all the creditors are less than twelve in number, then any one may file a petition in bankruptcy if his claim is $500 or over, and it matters not that the claim is not due. If the claims are provable in bankruptcy, this is all that is necessary. There is not bing providing that the claims shall be due in order to be

Therefore, if an insolvent debtor owes a note of $500 or more, and it has remained due and unpaid for thirty days or more, and all other debts owing by the debtor are not due and not to become due in many months, three creditors whose debts are not due, if the whole number of creditors is twelve or more, or any one creditor, if the number is less than twelve, may plunge the debtor into bankruptcy, even though the creditor whose debt is due is perfectly willing to wait. In such case the creditors suffer no damage or injury whatever, and creditors (or a creditor) whose debts are not due should not be permitted to institute a proceeding based on such an act or omission.

Involuntary bankruptcy should be based on fraud, or on acts and sins of omission or commission which actually endanger or damage all or substantially all the creditors. In no case should a person or creditor who is not injured by the actalleged be permitted to institute the proceeding. Mere insolvency should not be a ground of bankruptcy, for this would not permit good business men of little or no property to engage in business on borrowed capital. A small loss one day would involve him in a bankruptoy proceeding, which loss he might make good the next if let alone. I can not consent to a law that places the insolvent and the fraudulent debtor on the same plane.

Before it is enacted into a law this bill should be so guarded as to make it impossible that it be used as a means of oppression.

No one actuated by spite or malice should be committed to take

No one actuated by spite or malice should be permitted to take advantage of its provisions unless actually injured in a pecuniary sense by some act of the alleged bankrupt.

A person actually unable to pay his present debts has on borrowed capital and credit engaged in business (and hundreds, yes thousands do), and by honesty, fidelity, and hard work has made money legitimately and ultimately become a man of wealth. Thousands are now doing business in this way and on such capital. We should be wareful they there to be the same of the Thousands are now doing business in this way and on such capital. We should be very careful, then, that we do not enact a law which will permit the Shylocks to crush and drive out of business this large class of honest and enterprising dealers. Every little business mishap or neglect should not be turned into an act of bankruptcy. As I before said, only those acts and omissions should be so declared which defraud the one or all, or directly tend to the injury of substantially all the creditors in a particular one. Legitimate business enterprise is to be encourparticular case. Legitimate business enterprise is to be encouraged and fostered, not discouraged. It is not every case where we should permit the cutting of the pound of flesh, although under the law it may be legally claimed

Let us be cautious lest we make the ruin of business men a matter of easy accomplishment by grasping men and tricky attorneys, who with itching palms eagerly watch for an opportunity to pocket fees from wasted estates. Let us be cautious lest in permitting the taking of the one pound of flesh we make it possible and feasible for the business vultures to pick the victim to the bone, unjustly, unnecessarily, and to the damage of business and of the great community.

Section 7 provides that the death or insanity of the bankrupt shall not abate the proceedings, but that the same shall be conducted and concluded in the same manner so far as possible as though he had not died or become insane. To this provision should be added the following, "and in such case the executor or administrator of a deceased person and the committee of a lunatic or insane person shall be brought in and made a party to the proceedings." the proceedings.

It is no answer to this proposition to say that this might be done or probably would be done. The act itself should provide for the bringing in of the representative of the estate of the bankrupt or of the insane person.

Section 10 provides that suits pending against a bankrupt at the time he is so declared, if upon a claim from which a discharge in bankruptcy would be a release, shall be stayed until after an adjudication in bankruptcy or the dismissal of the peti-arter an adjudication in bankruptey or the dismissal of the perfition. It then provides that such action may be stayed until twelve months after such person is adjudicated a bankrupt or until the question of a discharge is determined.

I can see no good reason for this latter provision. All suits brought by or pending against a person declared a bankrupt at the time of the adjudication should be permitted to proceed to final judgment in the court where commenced in order that the final judgment in the court where commenced, in order that the claim may be there adjudicated and its amount determined and fixed or pronounced unfounded. Why should the determination of a contested claim be either stayed or transferred to another tribunal? The trustee of the estate may be substituted, and then the claim should be adjudicated where the suit is

The same section provides that the court may order the trustee to enter his appearance as defendant in a pending suit. To this should be added the words "against the bankrupt and defend the same." fend the same.

If a suit is pending against a bankrupt, the trustee should be made defendant and he should be required to defend the suit. Neither the trustee nor the creditors of a bankrupt should be permitted to allow or pay a claim which the bankrupt himself declares to be unfounded or exaggerated in amount.

While it may be perfectly prepare and just to take an estate.

While it may be perfectly proper and just to take an estate, preserve it, and apply it to the payment of the debts of the bankrupt, the bankrupt should not be deprived of the power to defend or have defended unjust claims made against him. To him it is all important that his estate pay a good dividend.

Section II provides for compositions with creditors and for the confirmation of the same, and it provides that, if a composition has been made, the consideration to be paid to the creditors and the money necessary to pay all preferred debts and the costs of the proceedings shall be deposited in a place to be designated by the court and subject to the order of the judge before the composition shall be confirmed.

I can see no good reason for this provision. How is the bankrupt to procure the money and make the deposit before a confirmation of the composition? It would be impossible in nine cases out of ten for this to be done. The property is in the hands of a trustee, and the bankrupt would have no power to give security and no one would be willing to advance the money for deposit until he had assurance that confirmation of the composition is to be made.

Far better will it be to provide that the composition may be confirmed by the court and that the money necessary to pay the creditors and preferred debts and the costs of the proceedings shall then be deposited in a place designated and subject to the order of the court. Also add a provision that before hearing an application for the confirmation of a composition the court may require the filing of a sufficient bond conditioned for the payment into court of the money necessary to perfect and carry out the terms of such composition. This will insure protection to the creditors, and such a bond the bankrupt could easily give. Men of money are not inclined to raise money and deposit it in court upon an uncertainty.

To this end I propose that on page 13, in lines 15 and 16, the words "and subject to the order of the judge" shall be stricken out and that in place thereof there shall be inserted the following:

The judge within ten days after the confirmation of such composition. Before hearing an application for the confirmation of a composition the court may require the filing of a sufficient bond conditioned for the payment into court of the money necessary to perfect such composition or to carry out and make effectual the terms thereof.

Also, in line 14, strike out the words "have been," and insert in place thereof "shall be."

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. There might be a property com-

Mr. RAY. Yes, as the gentleman suggests, there might be a property composition; but in any event, if the debtor was compelled to get the money from some other source, as he would be, he would find it impossible to give the security and get the money unless the composition were confirmed by the court, so that the one lending the money or advancing it might have some assurance that he would have good security on the property turned out. Usually this would be the property of the debtor involved in the proceeding. Why not confirm first and pay afterwards? Why compel a bankrupt to come into court with a large amount of ready money until it is decided that he will have use for it? Section 12 provides that the composition may be set aside at anytime within six months after it has been confirmed. well enough; but no provision is made for the reinstatement of the parties to their original position. This section should provide that, if a composition is set aside on the motion of any party or parties in interest, they shall return what they have received, and that only the parties moving and those making restitution shall be entitled to the benefits derived from their action. To this end I shall propose an amendment adding to section 12 these words:

In case such composition is set aside, the creditors who have received their pay thereunder may or may not return into court the sum or sums received by them respectively, pursuant to the terms of such composition, and only the creditors so refunding shall share the benefits of subsequent proceed-

Section 18 does not provide for the service of the writ of sub-pcena on the creditors. It seems to me that the writ should be served on each creditor named in the petition at least ten days before the return day thereof, in order that the creditors may appear and plead to the petition, in order that they may have notice of the proceeding. Otherwise the second subdivision of section 18 is of no avail. And how is the creditor to appear and controvert the facts alleged in the petition unless he has notice that the petition has been filed?

All petitions in bankruptcy should state the names and places of residence of the creditors, so far as known or reasonably as-

The gentleman who framed this bill has very wisely provided that a creditor may appear and contest the petition, may answer it, but he has not provided any means whatever, and thus far has refused to provide any means whatever, and thus far has refused to provide any means, by which the creditor may be notified of the pendency of the proceeding in the first instance. All this has an object, a deliberate object and purpose, and that is in the interest, as I said, of the creditors and against the in-terests of the debtors.

The third subdivision of section 18 should also provide that the bankrupt or any of his creditors may not only controvert the facts alleged in the petition, but that they may present any defense thereto. There may be a defense to the petition which could not be proved under a simple denial of the facts alleged in the petition. Especially would this be true if some of the amendments suggested to section 2 should be adopted by the House.

Section 29 in some of its aspects is a curiosity. It is made an offense punishable by imprisonment for a period not to exceed two years for the trustee to embezzle the entire estate of the bankrupt. If the estate is $2,000, or $1,000, or $500, and the trusbankrupt. If the estate is $2,000, or $1,000, or $500, and the trustee steals it and is caught, prosecuted, and convicted, he may be imprisoned for a term not exceeding two years. If the estate is $100,000, and the trustee steals it and is caught and convicted, still he can not be imprisoned for more than two years.

The amount of punishment meted out to him within this prescribed limit would depend altogether upon the condition of the scribed limit would depend altogether upon the condition of the judge at the time he pronounced the sentence. If the judge felt a little ugly, then a man who had stolen only an estate of $100 might, and probably would, get two years. On the other hand, if the judge happened to be a little mellow and tender-hearted from the effects of a good dinner, then, if the trustee had stolen an estate of a hundred thousand dollars, perhaps he would receive a light imprisonment, say two months; in any event however the imprisonment can not exceed two years.

It seems to me that there is truth in the old rhyme, "It is a sin to steal a pin, but still a greater to steal a tater."

The theory of this rhyme is that the greater the theft the greater the offense, and it does seem to me that we ought not to declare by law that the stealing of a million dollars shall not be more heavily punished than the theft of $500. Or is it so respectable to embezzle a large amount that the offender ought to be let off with a small punishment? I would suggest that a change be made in this respect. It will be noted that the trustee may steal the whole estate and only be punished by impris-onment for two years, while the poor bankrupt is subjected to precisely the same punishment if he should attempt to account for $5 of the property belonging to his estate by a fictitious loss If the poor bankrupt should steal from the trustee or expense. a cow for the purpose of providing milk for his infant children or should conceal one dollar of the fund, he is liable to the same punishment as is the trustee who steals the entire estate after it has come to his hands.

Mr. BRYAN. I ask that the time of the gentleman be extended until he concludes his remarks.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] is a Mr. OATES. member of the Judiciary Committee. I hope his time will be extended indefinitely. The Chair hears no objection. The gen-

The CHAIRMAN. tleman will proceed.

Mr. RAY. So, if some creditor proves a false claim against the estate, and the bankrupt fails to hunt up the trustee and disclose the fact, he may be sent to prison for two years, while the trustee, who has stolen the entire estate from the creditors, occupies the adjoining cell under precisely the same term of imprisonment. So, under the seventh subdivision of section 29, if the bankrupt, in contemplation of bankruptey, has obtained on credit any property, even five dollars' worth, with intent not to pay for it, or with the intent to prefer a creditor therewith, he may be punished the same as the trustee who has stolen the en-tire estate. So, under subdivision 11 of section 29, if the bankrupt, in contemplation of bankruptcy, shall have transferred any property purchased on credit otherwise than in the ordinary course of "his business," he may be punished in the same manner and to the same extent as the trustee who has stolen the entire estate.

This section, in my judgment, is mighty hard on the poor bankrupt, but very lenient to the thieving or dishonest trustee. Some merchant hard pressed by his creditors is contemplating bankruptcy; he has not determined on bankruptcy, but does not see his way out clearly, and sits on a keg of mackerel and seriously and sadly contemplates bankruptcy. Bankruptcy stares him in the way out clearly, and sits of a meg of mackerel and seriously and sadly contemplates bankruptcy. Bankruptcy stares him in the face. At his home up the street his children are crying for bread and perchance for fish. It so happens that he purchased the keg of mackerel on credit. In the ordinary course of "his business" he sells mackerel to his customers, but on this occasion he transfers some of the mackerel to his home to feed his children, or, to bring myself within the exact language, meaning, and intent of subdivision 11 of section 29, I will put it that he trades the mackerel to the baker for bread to meet the immediate necessities of his family

This act is declared to be a crime under section 29 of this bill, and if his contemplation of bankruptcy works out in actual bankruptcy, either upon his own petition or upon the petition of his creditors, he may be convicted of the offense, and in the discretion of the judge, sent to prison for two years. The trustee of his estate appointed by the court steals the whole of it and he too is convicted, but under the provisions of the same law cannot be sent to prison for a longer period than the bankrupt himself who listened to the cry of his children and sinned against a keg of mackerel.

Mr. OATES. You do not mean to say th man to the penitentiary for two years?
Mr. RAY. Certainly, if he is convicted.
Mr. OATES. How could he be sent to the You do not mean to say that a judge can send a

How could he be sent to the penitentiary without a jury trial?

Mr. RAY. But a jury under the precise facts I have stated would be compelled (if they were honest men, abiding by their would be competied (if they were nonest men, abiding by their oaths, to find the man guilty; upon his own testimony he would have to say, "I am guilty." Did he not get trusted for the mackerel; did he not at the time he took it and traded it off for bread-contemplate bankruptcy? Did he not know and think he must go into bankruptcy? The gentleman is too good a lawyer not to know that this man, trading fish for bread, though it was done to feed his children, was notacting "in the ordinary course of his business".

Mr. GOLDZIER. Do you not think it is rather a fishy case?
Mr. OATES. I did not take issue with you on your fish and bread trade at all. I take issue with you on the assertion of fact that a judge could send a man to the penitentiary.
Mr. RAY. Did I say penitentiary?
Mr. OATES. Well, penitentiary or prison, whatever it was.
Mr. RAY. I thought I said prison. Under the provisions of this bill the judge could do so.
Mr. OATES. Oh, no. Will the gentleman point out any clause of the bill that allows it?
Mr. RAY. Why, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama is too good a lawyer to deny that statement. Who sentences a man, let me ask, when convicted of a criminal offense? Mr. GOLDZIER. Do you not think it is rather a fishy case?

Mr. OATES. But it is for the jury to find him guilty, and then the sentence of the law is enforced.

Mr. RAY. Yes; but here the jury must find the man guilty, because under the provisions of this bill he must plead guilty if because under the provisions of this bill he must plead guilty if because under the provisions of this bill he must plead guilty if he pleads honestly, or be found guilty by the jury. The man who has done the simple thing that I have suggested must plead guilty as an offender against the law, if he tells the truth. The jury would be compelled to convict on that evidence.

I will admit, Mr. Chairman, that my illustration is an extreme one, but I could stand here and detail circumstances liable to arise within the operation of this law where it would be just as barsh and just as outrageous to imprison a man as in this sup-harsh and just as outrageous to imprison a man as in this sup-posed case. It is a violation of the law to do what I have sug-gested, and this bill so makes it and provides the penalty. That is what I mean.

Now, you enact a law that makes such a little trivial thing as that an offense against the law subjecting the offender to a harsh and unusual punishment, if you pass this bill as it stands.

Mr. OATES. I think if a jury convicted a man under such circumstances he could get out under the old law principle de cumstances he could get out under the old law principle de minimis non curat lex.

Mr. RAY. Well, the gentleman is so learned in his Latin that I will not undertake to follow him. I will not stop to bandy words with him. I wish he was more learned indrawing bankruptcy bills, and had given less of his time to Latin.

Mr. OATES. You had a part in the consideration and framing of the bill. Did you ever offer these amendments?

Mr. RAY. Why, the gentleman knows I had a quarrel with him constantly over these matters. Some of the amendments

Mr. RAY. Why, the gentleman knows I had a quarrel with him constantly over these matters. Some of the amendments that I suggested were put in; some were objected to; and since the gentleman has asked the question I will state that a majority of the Committee on the Judiciary were unable to agree upon this bill, and it only came into this House under a promise or agreement that every member of the committee should have the right on the floor of the House to propose such amendments as e saw proper or thought necessary to perfect the bill. Mr. OATES. And that promise will be kept as far as I am

Mr. RAY. I know it will; but you were intimating the possibility, as I understand, that I had assented to the bill in its present form.

Mr. OATES. Oh, no; I understand that you did not in its mr. OAIES. Oh, no, I understand that you did not in its present form. In the main you did, but you wanted it amended.
Mr. RAY. That is correct. I am in favor of a bankrupt law. I think we need one on the statute books of the country. I think we should have a permanent one; but what I am fighting against here are the unwise and harsh provisions of the bill which have found their way into the proposed measure and are in it as it came from the committee room. But I do not criticise the came from the committee room. But I do not criticise the gentleman from Alabama therefor. I acknowledge his great ability. At the same time I will criticise him in the way I have, and I do not think he will be angry at what I say.

Mr. BAILEY. If it will not disturb the gentleman from New York, I beg leave to remind him that when this bill was reached there was a bare quorum of the Judiciary Committee present. So far as the bill itself is concerned, unless it be amended the majority of the committee will acted grant the state of the committee of the committee will acted grant the state of the committee of the c so far as the bill itself is concerned, unless it be amended the majority of the committee will vote against it.

Mr. RAY. Well, I do not know how that may be. I am not prepared to give an opinion on that subject. I was only justifying myself in the opposition I am making to it, because I should not like to appear on the records of this House as having approved of a bill in committee and then come in here upon the floor of the House and attacked it in any feature. Every member of the committee comes to the control to the life. ber of the committee comes to the consideration of the bill with the permission of the committee to exercise his right of opposition in the manner that he may think wise and proper. We may tion in the manner that he may think wise and proper. We may advocate it, oppose it, propose, and, if possible, carry amendments. In the end we may vote for or against it.

Subdivision 11 of section 29 should be stricken out of this bill. It is impossible for any business man to live and do business without transferring property otherwise than "in the ordinary course of his business." Every man has a business which in legal contemplation is "his business." The business of the blacksmith is to make and repair implements and shoe horses: the business of the lawyer is to draw every sive advice and attend to suite of the lawyer is to draw papers, give advice, and attend to suits and proceedings in court: the business of the clergyman is to attend to the spiritual needs of his people and preach on the Sabbath day; the business of the merchant is to buy goods and sell them to his customers at wholesale or at retail, as the case may be; the business of the hotel-keeper is to lodge and feed his guests. Each may have property which he has obtained on credit, and this property may not be such as he uses in conduct-ing "his business." In contemplation of bankruptcy, with bankruptcy staring him in the face, he transfers this property for money with which to meet present and pressing necessities. He does with it what he has never done before, what the ordinary course of his business would not require or permit him to do. He is not versed in the law; he has not studied this act, or if he has he does not understand the meaning of this provision, and so he has become a criminal and subjected himself to imprisonment for two years.

I ask the members of this House, will you assent to it? Will you enact the provision I have just referred to into a law? If you doubt what I assert, examine subdivision 11 of section 29 of the bill. Read it for yourselves, and you will be convinced that my criticisms are justifiable. I repeat, then, this subdivision should be stricken from the bill.

Turn to subdivision 6 of section 29, in line 17, page 28. It is there provided that the bankrupt may be imprisoned for two years if he has-made a substantially false valuation, as a bankrupt, of any of the property of his estate in his schedule of property, or omitted therefrom any the property of his estate, or from the list of his creditors any person of whom he is indebted in a substantial amount, or included therein any person to whom he is not indebted, or included therein a creditor for an amount substantially more than the true indebtedness.

I would respectfully suggest that this be amended by inserting the words "knowingly and willfully" before the word "made," in line 17. If the bankrupt should knowingly and willfully do any of these things he ought to be punished, but he should not be punished if he does those acts or any of them willfully merely. If he omits from his schedule property belonging to his estate he does it willfully, of course, but he may not do it knowingly. What would be better would be to insert the words "knowingly and" before the word "willfully," in line 3, page 27.

Section 61 provides for the designation by order of certain banking institutions in which the moneys belonging to a bankrupt shall be deposited. The money thus deposited becomes the money of the bank, and the relation of debtor and creditor arises between the bank and the trustee or the bank and the creditors of the estate. While there is little chance for loss in such cases, it imposes no hardship on the bank to require it to give security in each case for the money deposited. If the bank is to have the benefit of the deposit during the pendency of the proceeding it should be willing to go to this expense and trouble.

It seems to me that the law itself should contain some provision as to the form and the amount of the bond to be required, and that the giving of the bond should in all cases be obliga-

Section 62 provides that the actual and necessary expense in-curred by officers in the administration of estates shall be re-ported in detail, examined, and approved or disapproved, and that if approved by the court, they shall be paid or allowed out of the assets of the estate in the administration of which they were incurred.

It seems to me that greater restrictions should be imposed upon the officers who administer estates in the matter of expenses. What class of expenses shall be considered necessary? penses. What class of expenses shall be considered necessary? May the trustee employ an attorney: and if so, how many may he employ, and what shall be the measure of their compensation? It seems to me that the door is left wide open for all ordinary estates to be swallowed up. The trustee may prosecute suits and the trustee may defend suits. The trustee may involve the estate in all sorts of contests, and in the large towns and cities especially the fees of lawyers and the expenses of such litigations could be swelled to unlimited amounts. In my judgment no litigation should be permitted without the consequent ment no litigation should be permitted without the consent and approval of the bankrupt himself and of a majority of the creditors, with a provision that such consent may be dispensed with by the court on a hearing of the parties, in case such consents can not be obtained.

I am quite well aware that it is impossible to provide by law expressly for all the exigencies of a proceeding in bankruptcy, but a bankrupt law which is so lax or wanting in safeguards as to permit the wasting of estates will result in no good and will produce great harm. Such a law, like its predecessors, will get speedily into disrepute and excite a popular clamor for its

Such a law, if enacted at all, should in its operation be just to the debtor and just to the creditors; it should be speedy in its operation, simple in its provisions, and easily understood. It should guard against frauds, whether committed or attempted by the debtor class, the creditor class, or the officers charged with its execution. It should provide for the saving and equitable distribution of the estates of bankrupts, and should be so that the greditors and not a head of the transport of the saving and equitable distribution of the estates of bankrupts, and should be so framed that the creditors, and not a horde of attorneys and officials, shall receive the assets of the estate in final distribution. Such a law will meet the approval of all classes of our citizens, and while it will work no hardships, it will enable thousands of honest hard-working men to escape from financial troubles into which they have fallen, or into which they may be precipitated by the faults and wrongdoing of others, or by unwise legislation respecting the financial and industrial interests of our great

It is now conceded by our Democratic friends that under this Administration the revenues are insufficient to meet the current expenses of the Government. The money in the Treasury to the extent of about $53,000,000 is made up of the proceeds of bonds sold to provide a fund for the payment of outstanding United States notes. It is a trust fund, and we have no more right to use it for the current expenses of the Government than we would have to sell the bonds on deposit to secure the national bank note circulation and appropriate the proceeds to meet such expenses. The Government is guilty of a breach of trust every time it puts its hand on a dollar of this gold reserve for any other purpose than the redemption of Government notes. And according to the report of the Democratic members of the Judiciary Committee every dollar now in the Treasury belongs to that fund. (Report

Still, it is proposed, seriously and gravely, to reduce the revenues of the Government by cutting down the duties on imports. It seems to be the theory of some that the less money we receive It seems to be the theory of some that the less money we receive into the Treasury the more we will have. They argue that the lower the import duties, the greater will be the receipts from that source. The same men argue that if we largely reduce the duties on imports there will be a great increase in the importation of foreign-made articles, and that therefore there will be a large increase in the duties collected and paid into the Treasury. Is it not true that we now import all the foreign-made articles and all the foreign merchandies that our people need?

Can we largely increase such importations without a correspond-Can we largely increase such importations without a correspond-ing decrease of our home productions, and if we have a large decrease in home productions shall we not throw our home labor out of employment, close our mills and factories, and bring disaster and ruin upon thousands of our traders and manufactu-

It seems to me that if the present policy of this House as semi-officially announced, and as well understood, is carried out that we shall have widespread disaster, not only in financial but in industrial circles. We shall have almost universal bankruptcy and absolute need for a bankrupt law.

It is wise for our Democratic friends to be prepared for the woe that has some to a slight extent through the mere threat of tariff tinkering and which is sure to come and bring universal suffering and distress if the tariff plank of the Democratic party is to be lived up to.

Therefore, let us pass this bill, and by it, so far as pe provide a way out for those who are to be plunged into this gulf of financial and industrial ruin, and who, even now, through well-of financial and industrial ruin, and who, even now, through wellgrounded fear, seem to totter upon the ragged edge of the abyss being prepared for them. [Applause.]

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to enter into a discussion of the bill, but to put upon record my objections to it in its present form, or in any form which it is liable to assume before it is put upon its final passage.

Without discussing whether it is as good a bill as can be drawn upon the theory which it embodies or not, I am willing to concede that those who have framed the bill and who have presented cede that these who have framed the bill and who have presented it are gentlemen of high ability as lawyers, and as I have ob-served this debate 1 have been impressed with the belief that we will give to those who framed the bill our praise, and then give our votes against their offspring.

The purpose of this bill, it seems to me, is apparent; and perhaps the gravest objection which can be made to it is that its real purpose is not the one which is most emphasized in its disreal purpose is not the one which is most emphasized in its discussion. When we attempt to discuss a bankruptcy bill, we always speak, if we speak in favor of the bill, of the great hardship to the debtor who is honest, who has given up his property to his creditors; the hardship to him in not being able to be relieved of the balance which he owes, so that he can commence life again; and we all recognize that if it were possible to so frame a law that every honest man who has failed without his intentional fault could give up his property fairly to his creditors, be released, and commence life again in a business way, that it would be wise. it would be wise

But the difficulty is that this bill is not demanded by that class of people. I think if we would look at the requests which have come to this body and to us individually in behalf of the bill we would find very few if any from the debtor class. The bill comes from the wholesaler, who desires some better way of collecting his debts; and the sympathy which is wasted upon the poor debtor who can not be relieved of the burden of his debt is wasted in the interest of the man who has much more concern for his debt than for the man who owes it. And I think one of the best evidences that the purpose of the bill is to aid the remote wholesaler is the fact that no bond is provided here to secure the debtor against injury, if the petition is wrongfully filed.

If a man goes into a State court and files an attachmentagainst a debtor, it being an extraordinary process, he is required to give bond, and if the attachment is wrongfully issued he is liable in damages to the man whose property is taken, or whose credit he has attacked.

In this bill there is no such provision. A man may be a dealer in a small town. He owes some person in a distant State. That person can come and file a petition in bankruptoy. He can throw discredit on that man, and in nine cases out of ten the petition will make the man a bankrupt, whether he was a bankrupt to begin with or not. You take a man in business, a business which is reasonably profitable, a man who is able to meet his debts as to pay all his debts. Put that man into bankruptcy, compel him to sell his assets at what they will bring, and, besides paying his debts, compel him to pay the cost of collecting his debts through a bankrupt court, and I assert that nine-tenths of the business men of the country would not be able to go through that court and pay their creditors in full.

Mr. OATES. Will the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BRYAN] Mr. ÖATES. Will the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BRYAN] allow me just there to say that while he truly states that the bill as framed does not require the petitioning creditors to give a bond when they undertake to put a man into bankruptcy, yet they can not seize nor interfere with his property. It remains in his possession, so that the proceeding against him to put him into bankruptcy is just like any other suit that is brought of an ordinary character, and the defendant has a right to defend against it. So if the grounds alleged in the petition are not true, according to the terms of the law, he gains his suit and is not adjudged a bankrupt at all. If they want his property seized, or suspect that he is going to dispose of it improperly, they are required to make affidavit to that effect and give bond, and if that bond is not given his property is not interfered with, unless and until after he is adjudged a bankrupt.

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman's answer does not meet my objection. The attack is upon the man's credit, and when that petition in bankruptey is filed, that man will be known through. out the business community as a bankrupt, and he can not wait until after he has gone into court and disproved it, nor can he recover, from this man who files the petition, the damages which he wrongfully suffers by having his credit attacked.

And I insist, Mr. Chairman, if the purpose of this bill is to protect the debtor, it must have a provision in it that if a person attacks the credit of a business man by filing a petition in bank-ruptcy, he shall give a bond to pay the defendant the damages which he suffers if he is mistaken in filing that petition; and I insist that unless that is done the gentlemen who favor this bill should withdraw their remarks about its being in the interest of the debtor.

Mr. OATES. If the gentleman will allow me, when we consider the bill under the five-minute rule, such an amendment will be in order.

will be in order.

Mr. RAY. - I want to call attention further to the fact that the poor debtor, when they file the petition against him, as the bill now stands, is not even permitted to get rid of the proceeding by going to the creditor who filed the petition and paying the debt. He should be permitted to get rid of the proceeding either by paying the money to the creditor, or, in case the creditor will not take it, he should be permitted to pay it into court.

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman from New York has very ably presented in detail many of the objections to this bill, and I fully agree with him that the objection which he now points out is a valid one, and I agree also that the objection which he called attention to, that the trustee was subject to the punishment of only two years in prison in case he embezzled the funds of the only two years in prison in case he embezzled the funds of the bankrupt, no matter how great those funds were, is an important one.

But without going into details, I simply call attention to the absence of a bond to show that the purpose is not to protect the debtor. If a creditor comes into my State and destroys the credit of one of the business men, that business man whose credit is destroyed should have his remedy. Can he go to St. Louis, Chicago, or New York, or to a distant city to prosecute his suit? It is impossible, sir, and yet you say to that business man that he can have his business destroyed, his credit ruined, and his property taken, and he shall not have the protection of a bond of the man who does it. a bond of the man who does it.

Mr. ALLEN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Nebraska if he thinks the creditor class would need any protection if we get rid of this silver legislation that we are likely to have. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, my opinion is, that if the news is true which has reached us to-day, of the probability of the unconditional repeal of the Sherman law and the establishment of a gold standard in this country, as I believe that contemplates, we will need some law to relieve the debtor of his debts; but I would rather have a voluntary bankrupt law than an involuntary one, because, Mr. Chairman, there will be enough voluntary bankruptcy when we feel the full force and effect of that change in our monetary system.

Mr. OATES. Then that limits your opposition to the involuntary clause?

Mr. BRYAN. I was going to say, Mr. Chairman, that if there could be introduced here a bill providing that whenever a debtor should fairly give up his property to his creditors and, as far as that property would go, honestly discharge his debts, and that, having done that, he could then come in and ask for a discharge, I would favor it; but I do not know that I would favor any plan ten investigations and the property would favor any plan ten investigations.

for involuntary bankruptcy enforced through the machinery of in the Federal courts.

Mr. OATES. Will the gentleman allow me just there? Does the bill meet your approbation except as to the involuntary part?

Mr. BRYAN. If all the involuntary part of this bill were taken out, the influences at work for the last four or five years to secure the passage of the bill would not be in favor of the bill. The great wholesale associations have inspired this measure; I do not mean to say any person in this House favors it for that reason, but that it has been inspired by the wholesale associations through their attorney. I do not believe they would ever come to Congress and ask for a voluntary bankruptcy law, and if you ever take the involuntary features out you will destroy all if you ever take the involuntary features out you will destroy all the bill that has propelling force in it.

Mr. ALLEN. Does the gentleman intend to intimate that he suspects Mr. Torrey, who has been around here for four or five years advocating this bill, is here purely in the interest of the oppressed debtors? [Laughter.]

Mr. BRYAN. I can not make the suggestion as gracefully as the gentleman from Mississippi, but in saying what I have in regard to the action of Mr. Torrey, as his name has been mentioned, I do not mean to reflect upon that gentleman, because I have had occasion to remark that I have never known of any person interested in the passage of a bill through this House who accement to be sofair in the presentation of a case or as courteous who seems to be so fair in the presentation of a case or as courteous as Mr. Torrey; and I wish that all outside persons who desire to assist in legislation here would follow the example of Mr. Torrey. But the fact that he is fair, the fact that he is simply, as far as I know, trying to show the advantages of this bill to the members does not take away the fact, nor does it disturb the fact, that the bill was drawn, brought to this House, and is urged through not in the interest of the poor debtor who is to be discharged, but in the interest of the creditor, who desires better means of Mr. OATES. Wi Mr. BRYAN. Ye

Will my friend allow me right there? Yes, sir.

Mr. BEYAN. Yes, sir.
Mr. OATES. Now, as Judge Torrey's name has been brought into this debate, and as on yesterday a gentleman saw proper to speak of a lobby here getting $15,000 per annum to carry this bill through, I desire to state that I have been serving on the Judiciary Committee through ten years, and I remember the first bankruptcy bill ever brought in was the Lowell bill, one framed by Judge Lowell, of Massachusetts, and was under the control of Mr. Pat Collins. Then the next one that was introduced and referred was the one known as the Torrey bill. Judge Torrey is the only man who in all these years I have ever met who could be said to be lobbying or working in favor of the bankruptcy

I have met him frequently. He has sat with the Judiciary Committee at its request in order that we might ask him ques-tions. He is an authority upon questions of bankruptcy law. I have never seen a more gentlemanly man or one who deporte himself in a more commendable manner than Judge Torrey. is here now, because I telegraphed to him the other day that the bill was going to be considered and requested him to come. I have consulted with him frequently about this subject. The bill bears his name, and I suppose he would take great pride in seeing it pass; but as to any lobby, or anybody being paid to come here in the interest of this bill, I believe that to be an absolute and downright falsehood. Certainly if there was, or if there is, any such thing, no man has ever dared to approach me in that way.

I desire to say further that in the statement of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BRYAN] as to Judge Torrey I entirely concur. I have never seen anything to object to in his conduct, and if there is any lobby in the interest of this bill, or if there has been such at any time, I have never met any body connected with it, nor have I ever seen or heard any authoritative statement, nor do I believe that it existed.

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman from Alabama does not understand that anything that I have said reflects upon Judge Torrey, or upon any other person in connection with this matter?

Mr. OATES. No, sir; but inasmuch as the subject came up, Iasked permission of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BRYAN] to make this statement.

Mr. BRYAN. I am perfectly willing, Mr. Chairman, to have the statement go into the RECORD, and to say further, that if there is to be any person here in the interest of this bill, there could be no better person here in the interest of this bill, there could be no better person than Mr. Torrey. He gave evidence of desiring to be perfectly fair. He asked me what objections I had to the bill, and seemed to be anxious to know whether anything could be done to perfect it, but I was not able to find any way of perfecting it without destroying all of the bill that would make it useful to those who desired it.

Mr. OATES. I have differed with Judge Torrey myself as to the provisions of the bill.

some of the provisions of the bill.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Chairman, with the permission of the gentleman from Nebraska, I desire to make a brief statement. I happened to mention Col. Torrey's name, but I did it by way of resenting any imputation upon him, because I regard him rather as my attorney in this matter. [Laughter.] Being one of the debtor class myself and very much interested in this bill, probdebter class myself and very much interested in this bill, probably too much so to vote upon it [laughter], I have supposed all the time that Col. Torrey was here as a pure philanthropist, representing me and trying to find a plan to get me out of my difficulties, which are similar to those in which a good many other people in this country find themselves, and, I repeat, I mentioned his name rather by way of resenting the imputation that he was here for any improvement.

that he was here for any improper purpose. [Laughter.]
Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I have been led by the questions which have been put to digress from what I had intended to say. simply rose to express my objections to the bill in its present form, or, as I have said, in any form which it is likely to assume. I do not believe that our experience of bankruptcy laws leads us to hope that this bill, if passed, will differ in its fate from those

I believe that the difficulties which attended upon the operation of previous bankrupt laws were inherent difficulties, and can not be eliminated from any law which seeks to enforce through the Federal Government and its courts involuntary bankruptcy. I believe that any such law will be oppressive and will work hardship, and that that oppression and that hardship will make the people who vote for it regret their action, and that it will be only a question of a short time when Congress will be glad be only a question of a short time when Congress will be glad to undo what many gentlemen now seem so willing to do. If we could, as I-have said, devise a law which would permit a man to obtain a release from his obligations when he had acted honestly with his creditors, and given up his property in settlement of his debts, I would be in favor of it; but I do not hope from this Congress, or perhaps from any succeeding Congress, any such law, because that kind of a bill does not come into Congress. The debtors do not ask it, but those who seek better means of enforcing their claims against debtors come in with these hills.

enforcing their claims against debtors come in with these bills enforcing their claims against debtors come in with these bills which involve both voluntary and involuntary bankruptcy, and the benefit of the debtor is made the excuse for giving additional advantage to the creditor. Therefore, sir, I shall vote against this bill. I shall be glad to vote for any amendments which may improve it. Many of these proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] I shall be glad to favor. Any amendments which may make the bill better I shall vote for, but when all have been adopted, and when we have improved it as much as we can, even if we should put in the clause providing that a bond shall be given by the man who files a petition, so that the debtor shall be to that extent protected, it should not be passed if the involuntary feature is retained. Even if we provide passed if the involuntary feature is retained. Even if we provide for a bond, I believe still that in our larger Western States you can, under such a law, take men from one corner of the State, drag them to the Federal court in another part of the State, and there make them give up their property and have it all absorbed in expenses and in the fall in price resulting from its sale under such circumstances.

I believe that as long as you undertake to administer a bank-rupt law in the Federal courts you will subject your citizens to the danger of being carried away from home, to the hardship of being taken from their State courts and local tribunals, and made to settle their difficulties in the Federal courts, and that, therefore, the law will be so obnoxious to the people as to make its speedy repeal necessary.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise.
The motion was agreed to. The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OUTHWAITE, from the Committee on the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration a bill (H. R. 139) to establish a uniform system of hankruptey, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. Covert, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence for four days on account of important business.

The House then, on motion of Mr. Oates (at 4 o'clock and 42) minutes p. m.), adjourned.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on the Judiciary was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2692) to permit Anna M. Coleman, a widow, to prosecute a claim, and the same was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, October 25, 1893.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m., at the expiration of the The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate resumes its session.

The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, being House bill No. 1, which will be stated by title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 1) to repeal a part of an act, approved July 14, 1890, entitled "An act directing the purchase of silver bullion and the issue of Treasury notes thereon, and for other purposes."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] is entitled to the floor. Before he proceeds the Chair will lay before the Senate a bill from the House of Representatives for reference; and also present several petitions.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 9) to transfer the Morris Island life-saving station, near Charleston, S. C., to Sullivans Island, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a petition of the Democratic State committee of California, praying for the enactment of legislation placing certain restrictions upon the immigration of Chinese and Japanese; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented petitions of the drug trade section of the New York Board of Trade and Transportation; of the Iroquois New York Board of Trade and Transportation; of the Iroquois Club, of Chicago, Ill.; of citizens of Duluth, Minn.; of the Wholesale Saddlery Association, of St. Louis, Mo., and of the Trading Men's Democratic Club, of Peoria, Ill., praying for the immediate repeal of the silver-purchasing clause of the so-called Sherman law; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MCMILLAN presented a petition of the Michigan Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, of Grand Rapids, Mich., praying for the repeal of the so-called Geary Chinese law; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. TELLER presented a petition of bankers and members of

Mr. TELLER presented a petition of bankers and members of the Franklin Club of Cleveland, Ohio, representing the views of the wage-workers of that city, praying for the unconditional re-peal of the silver-purchasing clause of the so-called Sherman law; which was ordered to lie on the table.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 1126) granting to the Des Moines Rapids Power Company the right to erect, construct, operate, and maintain a wing dam, canal, and power station in the Mississippi River, in Hancock County, Ill.; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WOLCOTT introduced a bill (S. 1127) for the relief of Nasario Gonzales; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Depredations.

to the Committee on Indian Depredations.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 1128) for the relief of Barney Morgan, teamster, Quartermaster's Department; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

JUDICIAL OPINION ON SILVER COINAGE.

Mr. PEFFER. With the consent of the Senator from Nevada, I ask leave to offer a resolution, and I will state the way in which it comes. There is some difference of opinion on the part of it comes. There is some difference of opinion on the part of members of this body, and also persons outside of the body, who are discussing the matters pertaining to the financial situation, and they are anxious to have the resolution I submit referred to the Committee on the Judiciary in connection with the one referred there a few days ago, offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. Morgan]. I ask that the resolution may be read and then referred.

Mr. HOAR. Let it be read for information, the question of its

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas a difference of opinion exists as to the legal effect of the repeal of a part of the act of February 28, 1878, by the passage of the act of July 14, 1880; and
Whereas some persons maintain that the free and unlimited coinage of the silver dollar at the ratio of 16 to 1 is the law of the land and has been since the passage of the act of February 28, 1878: Therefore, Resolved by the Senate, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and it is hereby, directed to investigate and report on this question at its earliest convenience.

Mr. PEFFER. I will state that the resolution comes from per Mr. Perfer. I will state that the resolution connection per sons on the outside of this Chamber. It is entirely respectful, and I hope it will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

STATEMENT REGARDING PACIFIC RAILROADS.

Mr. KYLE. Will the Senator from Nevada yield to me for just one moment?

Mr. STEWART. Yes, sir.
Mr. KYLE. I have here a statement in reference to the Central and Union Pacific Railways. It is a statement of the operating expenses, gross earnings, net earnings, etc., of the two railways, compiled from the report of Governor Pattison, of Pennsylvania, and Poor's Railway Manual. It is a very important statement, and is in a condensed form. I should like to have unanimous consent that it be published as a miscellaneous document.

Mr. CULLOM. By whom was it compiled?

Mr. KYLE. It was compiled by Mr. Selden Cowdon.

Mr. CULLOM. A Government officer?

Mr. KYLE. A statistician of this city.

Mr. CULLOM. Not a Government officer?

Mr. KYLE. Not a Government officer.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Dakota? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. is so ordered.

COÖPERATION OF FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS IN WORLD'S FAIR.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to report back; without amendment, from the Committee on For-eign Relations the joint resolution (H. Res. 66) that the acknowl-edgments of the Government and people of the United States edgments of the Government and people of the United States be tendered to various foreign governments of the world in commemoration of the discovery of America by Christopher Columbus. It is a joint resolution passed by the House of Representatives expressing the acknowledgments of the Government and people of the United States to the various governments of the world who have generously and effectively cooperated in the Quadro-Centennial Exposition held in Chicago. If the joint resolution is to pass at all it should be passed before the close of the Exposition, as it requires acknowledgments to be delivered to the representatives of various countries, and I ask that It be put upon its passage now. I think there will be no objection to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read. The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc. (1) That it is the sense of Congress that the acknowledgments of the Government and people of the United States betendered to the various foreign governments of the world who have so generously and effectively cooperated in the quadricentennial Exposition held in Chicago in commemoration of the discovery of America by Christopher Columbus.

(3) That a certified copy of the foregoing resolution be prepared in suitable form by the Secretary of State of the United States, and forwarded through the customary diplomatic channels to the respective foreign governments who have participated in said Exposition.

ernments who have participated in said Exposition.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the joint resolution as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOAR. The joint resolution is reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; it is reported unanimously.

Mr. HOAR. It seems to me it is an exceedingly awkward and imperfect method of dealing with this question. The joint resolution provides that the acknowledgments of the United States be tendered to the various foreign governments, and the mode be tendered to the various foreign governments, and the mode of doing it is to give a sort of circular copy of the resolution, so that the Government of Great Britain will receive from President, or the Department of State, a copy of a resolution that our Government presents its compliments or tenders its auknowledgment to all the foreign governments of the world. It

Mr. SHERMAN (in his seat). You are mistaken. Mr. HOAR. The Senator says sotto voce I am mistaken. Mr. SHERMAN. I will state—

Mr. HOAR. Very well, let me proceed. It seems to me that the President of the United States should make an express courteous acknowledgment to each government by name, saying that the Government of the United States tenders its acknowledgment to the Government of France, or Mexico, or whatever may be the government. Let the joint resolution be read again, Mr. President.

Mr. CULLOM. The joint resolution reads as follows:

That it is the sense of Congress that the acknowledgments of the Government and people of the United States be tendered to the various foreign governments of the world who have so generously and effectively cooperated in the quadricentennial Exposition held in Chicago, in commemoration of the discovery of America by Christopher Columbus.

That a certified copy of the foregoing resolution be prepared in suitable form by the Secretary of State of the United States, and forwarded through the customary diplomatic channels to the respective foreign governments who have participated in said Exposition.

Mr. HOAR. That is just what I object to exactly.
Mr. SHERMAN. The Committee on Foreign Relations con-

Mr. SHERMAN. The Committee on Foreign Relations considered the resolution and unanimously regarded—
Mr. HOAR. I had not yielded the floor. I have not finished what I wish to say. I ask to have the joint resolution read. The Senator said sotto voce that I do not understand it.
Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator is mistaken. The committee

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator is mistaken. The committee regarded the second clause of the joint resolution as enabling the Secretary of State not only to—

Mr. HARRIS. I do not know whether it is because Senators do not speak loud enough or because there is too much conversation, but I can not hear a word.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Ohio was speaking in a low voice because he had not the floor.

Mr. HARRIS. I should be glad to hear.

Mr. SHERMAN. I thought the Senator from Massachusetts had yielded the floor.

Mr. HOAR. I had not.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I will sit down until the Senator is

Mr. HOAR. I think we should observe some degree of ceremonial or propriety in dealing with foreign governments. The governments of the world have with great generosity contributed vastly to the success of this wonderful national event, the commemorative Exposition at Chicago; and it is proposed very properly to make an acknowledgment to every government that has so contributed. How is it proposed to be done? It is proposed to be done by passing a joint resolution that the Congress of the United States tenders its acknowledgment to the various governments of the world which have done so and so, not specifying by name any one whatever, and then the second clause of the resolve is:

(2) That a certified copy of the foregoing resolution be prepared in suitable form by the Secretary of State of the United States, and forwarded through the customary diplomatic channels to the respective foreign governments who have participated in said Exposition.

The Emperor of Germany, and the President of the Republic of France, and the Government of Great Britain will receive a certified copy of the first resolution. What ought to be done, it seems to me, is that instead of the second resolution the Presiseems to me, is that instead of the second resolution the President shall be authorized to communicate to each government by name the obligations of the United States to that government specifically for its share, and that the mode proposed in this hastily drawn resolution would be almost a slight on any government. It is as if we should pass a resolution that the Government of the United States expresses its thanks to those citizens who contributed to the Exposition. There is no compliment to anybody in it, and no courtesy to anybody in it, and nothing which is individual or personal to any nation in it. If the Senator from Ohio will accept an amendment to the effect that the President of the United States be requested to forward to each foreign government that has participated in said Exposition the acknowledgment of Congress for such participation it would conform to my ideas. Otherwise I shall object to the further consideration of the joint resolution. Mr. CULLOM. That would involve the necessity, I think, of

Mr. CULLOM. That would involve the necessity, I think, of remodeling the joint resolution.

Mr. HOAR. I think it would.

Mr. CULLOM. Almost entirely.

Mr. HOAR. No; not the first resolve.

Mr. CULLOM. I am inclined to think it would, but whether that is the case or not, I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts. The truth is that the Government of the United States. setts. The truth is that the Government of the United States can not say too much within reasonable bounds in returning its thanks to the separate governments of the world which have taken part in this great Exposition. If the joint resolution as proposed does not cover the ground sufficiently, and it strikes me it does not, as the Senator from Massachusetts indicates, I think it would be well for the committee to change it, so as to make it as strong as the duty of the Government would dic-

If the Secretary will take down the amendment I suggested I will move an amendment, and then let the committee consider it. I move to substitute for the second resolution the following:

That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to each foreign government that has participated in said Exposition the acknowledgment of Congress for its contribution.

That is the substance of what I should like to have incorpor-

Mr. SHERMAN. Although I do not know that the joint resolution came from the Secretary of State or the State Department, I have no doubt that it did. It was introduced in the House of Representatives and it passed there in this form. I think it contains in precise form what is desired. Here is an expression in proper language, to which the Senator does not object, of the acknowledgment of the Government and people of the United acknowledgment of the Government and people of the United States passed by Congress, and then this acknowledgment by Congress is to be communicated to these different governments, as a matter of course, each one separately, embodying a copy of the resolution, and in language that may be prescribed by the Secretary of State in due form. The Secretary of State would undoubtedly, in proper form, as here authorized, in a suitable way, through the customary diplomatic channels, communicate to each government a copy of the resolution of Congress, which is the expression of the will and acknowledgments of the people of the United States. ple of the United States.

The Committee on Foreign Relations regarded this as a com-pliment which ought to be bestowed now, before the Exposi-tion closes. It was thought proper to pass the joint resolution in the present form, but I have no objection to any amendment that may be suggested, and if the Senator from Massachusetts wants time until to-morrow to look over it and suggest an amendment I have no objection.

Mr. HOAR. I am satisfied with the one I have suggested.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Committee on Foreign Relations were unanimous on the subject and thought the joint resolution ought to be acted on promptly; but one day will not make much difference, and if the Senator desires time to look over it until tomorrow and prepare an amendment, let the joint resolution go

Mr. CULLOM. I agree with the Senator from Ohlo that we ought to act on the resolution very promptly. There are only three or four days remaining before the time for closing the Fair. Mr. HOAR. Is the Sonator satisfied with the amendment I

Mr. CULLOM. I think that amendment will be entirely sufficient if it does not conflict with any other portion of the joint

Mr. HOAR. Suppose we let the matter stand over and the Senator from Ohio can call it up again.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection the resolution will go over

Mr. SHERMAN subsequently said: The Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. Hoar) has submitted an amendment to the joint resolution, to which I have no objection, and upon which I should like to have the action of the Senate now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BERRY in the chair). The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. Strike out all of paragraph 2 of the joint resolution and insert in lieu thereof:

That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to ach foreign government that has participated in said Exposition the acnowledgment of Congress for its contribution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HOAR, the title was amended so as to read:

"A joint resolution (H. Res. 66) that the acknowledgments of the Government and people of the United States be tendered to various foreign governments of the world who have participated in commemoration of the discovery of America by Christopher

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. Towles, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the concurrent resolution of the House to print copies of the hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Sen-

A bill (H. R. 101) to amend section 4131 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; and

A bill (H. R. 3297) providing for the construction of a steam revenue cutter for service on the Great Lakes.

W. L. HARDY AND OTHERS.

Mr. BUTLER, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. George on the 19th instant, reported it without amendment, and it was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, directed to communicate to the Senate the present status of the claim of W. L. Hardy. John L. Carter, and William T. Holland against the Government of Spain for damages occasioned by their illegal arrest on board the brig Georgian, of the coast of Yucatan, by a Spanish warship, in May, 1850, and their subsequent imprisonment; what obstacles exist in the enforcement of said claim, and what action, if any, is needed to be taken by Congress in reference to the settlement of the same.

Mr. BUTLER. The resolution simply calls upon the State Department for information, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. FAULKNER. I do not rise for the purpose of making any objection, but it is understood, of course, that these proceedings are taken by unanimous consent, not displacing the measure now before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. By unanimous consent. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution just read? The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

MARSHAL'S EXPENSES IN NEW YORK.

Mr. KYLE. With the permission of the chairman of the Committee on Finance, I should like to call up the resolution submitted by myself on the 16th of October calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury for certain information relative to the expenses incurred by the United States marshal for the southern district of New York.

Mr. VOORHEES. If it leads to no debate there is no ob-

The resolution was read, and agreed to, as follows: Resolved by the Senate of the United States. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish to the Senate, as soon as may be practicable, a statement in writing of the expenses incurred by John W Jacobus, United States marshal for the southern district of New York, on account of deputy, assistant deputy marshals and special deputy marshals appointed by him, the said John W Jacobus, in and about the Presidential and Congressional election of 1892; the amount paid to each such deputy, assistant deputy marshals and special deputy marshals, together with their names and amounts of such payments to each.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

A bill (H. R. 101) to amend section 4131 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; and

A bill (H. R. 3297) providing for the construction of a steam revenue cutter for service on the Great Lakes.

PURCHASE OF SILVER BULLION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed considera-tion of the bill (H.R.1) to repeal a part of an act approved July 14, 1890, entitled "An act directing the purchase of silver bullion and the issue of Treasury notes thereon, and for other pur-poses," the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. PEFFER to the subctitute reported by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. STEWART. I do not want to parcel out the floor, but the Senate has been very kind to me in allowing me to suspend my speech that my colleague might proceed. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. Pugh] desires to submit a few remarks this morning, and if the Senate will allow me to go on after he concludes, I will give way. I ask unanimous consent that that course may

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. FAULKNER. What is the request? Mr. STEWART. That I may give way to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PURES], and then go on with my speech.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nevada asks permission to resume the floor after the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Alabama. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Alabama will proceed.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President, the debate on the bill to repeal the provision of the act of 1890, known as the Sherman law, that requires the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase at the market price 4,500,000 ounces of silver bullion and to issue in payment therefor certificates redeemable in coin, is one of the most important and instructive debates ever had in the Congress of the United States, because it involves the whole question of finance—the use of gold and silver as money—the issue of paper as currency to represent gold and silver, whether issued by the Federal Government as the principal, or national banks as fiscal agents of the Government, and also whether States shall charter banks to aid in supplying currency.

These questions are conceded to be of world-wide importance, as they underlie and regulate all the material transactions of mankind, and especially at this time are they engaging the earnest attention and thoughtful consideration of financiers, politicians, statesmen, and people of all pursuits in Europe America. Is it not a sad commentary to go down in history that the Senate of the United States, admitted to be the greatest lawmaking body in the world, while struggling with these momentous questions should be subjected to the use of the whip and spur applied from the outside by the reckless, unscrupulous, and spur applied from the outside by the reckless, unscruptions, and irresponsible adventurers and speculators and conspirators against the general welfare employed in the service of money against labor and property to "hurry up and cease talking—debate is useless—the speeches are nonsense—nobody listens—nobody reads—the people want final action—the majority is ascertained and the majority must rule"? The wolves on Wall street and their keepers are howling for blood. They think they smell the dead body of silver and they have become ravenous.

Who are these accusors and whom do they represent? How much credibility and influence have they in the communities where they live and where their papers are published and circulated? To test their influence and the accuracy of their statements as to public sentiment, suppose a mass meeting were called of the people living in the town, city, or county where these pa-pers are published, and where the editors reside, and that in such meeting the editor of the paper published there were to introduce a resolution declaratory of his financial opinions and policies and indorsing the House bill now pending in the Senate for the unconditional repeal of the only silver law now in existence, and condemning the action of the Senators who oppose the bill, how much influence would the editor have and exert upon such meeting in forming its opinion, and what weight would his statements that nearly all the people were clamoring for immediate and unconditional repeal of the only silver law have with

I feel perfectly confident that there is not a town, city, or county in any State in the South where such an editor could be induced to call such a meeting or to offer such a resolution, or in favor of which he would exert any influence, or make or in favor of which he would exert any inducate, or make or direct the opinion of a single man in the meeting, or where such a resolution could be passed. And yet all these editors are intelligent and worthy gentlemen. My colleague and myself, on our own knowledge of the people we represent and their practically unanimous opinion in favor of the free coinage of silver, and on letters and memorials coming from every county, town, and city in our State, from men we know to be representative man wall informed upon the subject of public opinion where men, well informed upon the subject of public opinion where they reside, and representing to us that nine-tenths of the people heartily approve our position and action on the repeal bill, do not believe that any mass meeting anywhere in Alabama, called on reasonable general notice, would pass such a resolution if all the editors in the State were to attend and urge its passage. We challenge them to try it in any county.

How the people stand on the questions involved in this repeal bill, and whether the Democratic party is to be enlisted into the service of the gold-standard advocates, will certainly be decided in the Congressional and Presidential elections in 1894 and 1896.

Mr. President, no debate the Congress has ever had has been more legitimate and orderly, none more necessary to inform the people about a matter of momentous importance to them and their posterity, and I do not believe that any debate has ever been of greater value and usefulness, and it will prove in the future more destructive of the aims of the enemies of the people. The debate has clearly marked the lines that separate the contend-ing parties to this controversy. I do not mean the lines that locate the selfish, the unscrupulous, and greedy horde who push themselves to the front in this agitation, but I mean those who are actuated by sincere and well-formed convictions and who are endeavoring to discharge to the best of their ability a great public duty in this mighty contention.

The immediate question before the Senate is, shall the silverpurchase part of the act of 1890 be unconditionally repealed—that s, repealed without any substitute? There can be no disagree as to where silver will be left by such a repeal. Could another ounce of silver be purchased by the Government to be coined into money, or made the basis of any certificate to go into our present volume of currency? Could another ounce of silver be carried to any mint to be coined and stamped as money? Every Sonator must answer no. Then it is indisputable that as to the future of silver for all increased money uses, it will be left precisely where it was by the odious law of 1873, which dropped silver from our coinage laws.

can be done safely and in accordance with the Democratic platform, which they urge condemns the Sherman law and demands its immediate repeal, and that those parts of the platform following this condemnation and demand, that pledge the party to the use of both gold and silver as standard money and to the coinage of both without discrimination in favor of either metal and that each dollar coined shall be equal in intrinsic value and purchasing power, and that the ratio of the number of grains in each dollar shall be adjusted by international agreement or by Congressional legislation, are separable from and independent of the demand for the repeal of the Sherman law.

On the other hand those Democrats who oppose unconditional repeal of the Sherman law as provided in the bill reported from the Finance Committee do so for the reason, among many others of greater importance, that the Democratic platform could not have been intended to pledge the party to the support of a sep-arate and independent bill containing no other provision than a single repealing section without enacting in the same bill the necessary and rightful law to establish and carry out the financial system and policy declared to be the true system and policy in the platform. If it be a sound system why delay its benefits

It looks suspicious when action is delayed without any just or plausible reason. Our ability to adopt the platform system of currency will surely be greatly impaired by unconditional repeal.

The plain reason why such could not have been the intention and meaning of the platform is that the party in national con-vention made a declaration of its principles, policies, and measures which the President and the members of Congress to be elected by the party in the election in November, 1892, were pledged to carry out by laws which were to be enacted in the place of those which the platform specifies and condemns. The McKinley tariff laws are condemned and the kind of tariff laws to be enacted in their stead is defined in the platform. The Sherman law is condemned and the kind of currency laws to be enacted in its place is defined in the platform.

The repeal of the 10 per cent tax on the issue of State banks is demanded, and what law shall be enacted on the subject of

The Federal election laws are condemned and their repeal demanded, and what laws to be enacted in their place is left exmanded, and what laws to be enacted in their pince is left ex-clusively with the States. So that it is manifest that when the platform condemus an existing Federal law and demands its re-peal, it imposes a duty upon the Congress and the President to be elected on it of substituting in the place of the law to be re-pealed the better laws which the platform approves. Besides, it is manifest that the unconditional repeal of the Sherman law is demanded, and no substitute proposed, and no companying is demanded, and no substitute proposed, and no compromise permissible by the President and those who support his position for reasons and purposes which have been completely uncovered in this debate, leaving the friends of silver without the possi-bility of getting any silver law as good as the Sherman law while Mr. Cleveland is President. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAYl is no timeserver, he is no trimmer, he is perfectly honestin his convictions, and fearless in expressing and enforcing them. I regard him as a fair exponent and representative of the best element of the Eastern Democracy to the fullest extent that the intelligent, well-to-do members of the Democratic party who are not bankers, importers, or money-lenders favor bimetallism—that is, what use is to be made of silver and how such use is to be secured with the aid and assistance of the Eastern Democracy, of which the Senator from Delaware is a true type and representative. We will take the Democratic platform adopted at Chicago in 1892 for illustration of the position and difference of the two wings of the national Democratic party on the question of the use and coinage of gold and silver as made manifest by and pending the present debate.

It was intended by that language in the Democratic platform, if we can argue at all from language, that it should be broad enough to hold every Democrat who believed in bimetallism, whether by international agreement or by legislative enactment. It did not intend to read me out of the party because I honestly believe that the bimetallism aimed at in that platform can only be obtained efficiently, obtained usefully, obtained for the benefit of the great masses of the people of this country, by an international agreement.

I think I can safely affirm that there are not a half dozen Senators who intend to support the House bill now pending for unconditional repeal who have not expressed, or will not express, the opinion that bimetallism, on the basis of unlimited free coinage of both gold and silver, established by Congressional enactment independent of an international agreement, is an utter impossibility. The same opinion has been expressed by President Cleveland without equivocation, ambiguity, or the affectation of misunderstanding.

I have explained the unmistakable position of the Eastern Democracy, of which President Cleveland is the exponent and representative, and that is that there can be no equal use of gold representative, and that is that there can be no equal use of gold and silver as standard money; there can be no coinage of both gold and silver without discriminating against either metal; there can be no holding on to such bimetallism by the Democratic party without an international agreement; that it is impossible by Congressional legislation independent of concurrent and joint action by the United States and foreign nations.

Repeal the Sherman law wips out every Congressional silver

Repeal the Sherman law, wipe out every Congressional silver enactment, plant us on the gold basis, and on that leverage the repealers promise to strike for an international agreement as the last hope for silver and gold bimetallism, and failing to obtain it we must accept our destiny with foreign nations on the gold basis, and adapt ourselves, as best we can, to the government of gold, with gold, and for gold. The absolute dependence of binetallism on an international agreement, and the hopelessness and absurdity of reviving the free coinage of sliver by any law of the United States without the concurrence and support of foreign nations in a joint agreement is explicitly declared ort of foreign nations in a joint agreement is explicitly declared in his late message to the present Congress, and that construction of his message is fully verified by the President's letter written the 25th ultimo to Governor Northen, of Georgia.

After stating the usual platitudes about honest money, which can not exist in the opinion of the President without being able to stand the crucial test of equal purchasing and debt-paying power with gold in all the markets of the world, he proceeds to support the substance of the whole letter in one sentence as sum up the substance of the whole letter in one sentence, as

I am therefore opposed to the free and unlimited coinage of silver by this country alone and independently; and I am in favor of the immediate and unconditional repeal of the purchasing clause of the so-called Sherman law.

In order to bring this matter squarely before the Senate and the country I will suppose that the quotation I have made from the President's letter had been offered in the Chicago convention as the financial plank in the Democratic platform. It would have read as follows:

The Democratic party is opposed to the free and unlimited coinage of siler by this country alone and independently; and in favor of the immediate and unconditional repeal of the purchasing clause of the so-called Sherman

How many States in the Westand South would have voted for such a declaration in the platform? I am sure it would not have received the support of a single Southern State.

I do not believe that a single delegate from any Southern State can be found who will say that it was his understanding or that of any other delegate in the convention, or that such an understanding was suggested in the convention, that the platform as adopted could possibly be construed to mean or that it could be perverted or distorted to mean that the Democratic party was opposed to the free and unlimited coinage of silver on any ratio between the two metals by this country alone and independently of any agreement with foreign nations. The platform as adopted expressly declared for the equal use of both gold and silver as standard money and not the use of one as standard and the other assubsidiary money—pin money in the retail trade—and the free coinage of both without discrimination on a ratio to be determined by an international agreement or by this country alone and independently by Congressional legislation.

The demand for the unconditional repeal of the purchasing clause of the so-called Sherman law for the purpose public avowed by the President in his message and his Northen letter, and repeated by 90 per cent of his Democratic supporters and and repeated by 30 per cent of his Democrate supporters and all of his Republican friends, of closing the door to any more ex-pansion of our silver currency by this country alone and inde-pendently unless we can in the indefinite future restore silver to coinage in the mints of Europe as well as in the United States coinage in the mints of Europe as well as in the United States by some international agreement, is an interpolation which materially changes the Democratic platform by striking out the only provision in it which secured the support of the Democrats of the South and the West, and that is the plain declaration that the bimetallism defined in the platform could and would be secured in one of two ways international agreement or by Convention. cured in one of two ways—international agreement or by Congressional legislation by this country alone and independently of any agreement with foreign nations.

But now the Southern and Western Democracy are informed for the first time, after they have put Mr. Cleveland and the Eastern Democracy in power, that there must be an immediate repeal of the Sherman law and no more coinage of silver by this country alone and independently, and that we must wait and de-pend upon European nations for any more expansion of our siler currency.

And yet the President expresses his "astonishment at the op-And yet the President expresses his "astonishment at the opposition in the Senate to such prompt action as would relieve the present unfortunate situation." Action demanded alone by the bankers and bondholders and money-lenders of New York and Boston and the editors and correspondents in their service; action that would relieve the situation by the assurance and guaranty that there was to be no more "silver coinage by this country alone and independently" and only by an international agreement which Wall street money kings would have an influential part in formulating. ential part in formulating.

I am satisfied that nine-tenths of the unconditional repealers

do not desire free coinage or any coinage of silver by an international agreement, and I do not believe that President Cleveland desires it, or will make any earnest effort to secure it. He has never said he expected or desired any international agree-My opinion is that the President entertains the sincere conviction that we now have as much silver as we can possibly utilize in our circulation, in accordance with his gold-standard opinions, and that we can go no further in silver coinage without crossing the danger line that separates us from silver monometallism. That is the opinion of the President and the Eastern Democrats and Republicans on the question of the expansion of our silver currency and the undertaking to hold on to both silver and gold as standard money, and the coinage of both gold and silver without discrimination against either metal.

It is this opinion of the President and the East that unites them in making the persistent and uncompromising demand for the unconditional repeal of the purchasing clause of the so-called Sherman law; and it is this clearly defined line of radical difference that separates the President and the Democracy of the East from the Democratic platform and the Western and Southern Democracy, who constitute 80 or 90 per cent of the elective power of the Democratic party.

Mr. President, the plain reason for the difference between the East and the South and the West on the currency question is the East and the South and the West on the currency question is the undisputed fact that the East is the creditor section, just as England is the creditor nation, and the South and the West are the debtor sections. And this fact also explains why the East, in the United States, and England agree in opinion and are in the arry cooperation in the undertaking to force this country to the gold basis. Lombard street, in London, and Wall street, in New York, are the money centers in these countries, and it is there that the magazines are located that furnish all the ammunition in the war on silver.

Mr. President, we have heard the cry that the majority must rule; that the Senate must exercise the power of self-government. That is all right. The majority ought to rule, but the majority have long ago decided how it must rule. The Consti-tution—the paramount law—the law unalterable by Congress, and that all of us have sworn to support, has expressly secured to as small a minority as one-fifth of the Senators present the power of deciding how the majority shall rule, and in this case it can rule by agreeing to a reasonable compromise. The rule of the majority is oftentimes the rule of tyranny—destructive of liberty—and I defy the naming of a single instance when the minority by the exercise of its extraordinary powers and methods ever defeated the rule of the majority against the will of the

I have no more doubt than I have of my existence that a larger majority of the people of the United States are against the unconditional repeal of the Sherman law than there ever was against the passage of the force bill or any other iniquitous measure that was ever defeated by the minority by the use of authorized methods. Ah, but it is claimed that there is a majority for unconditional repeal in both Houses of Congress. If that be true, how and when was the majority obtained? How did the Senate and House stand when they were elected, and how were they expected to stand by their pledges?

How did the Senate and House stand when President Cleveland was inaugurated? How did the Senate and House stand when Congress met in extra session, and before they received the President's message? Oh, that I had the power of having those questions investigated and answered. I do not believe I can be mistaken in the fact that when the Senate and House were elected, when the President was inaugurated, and when Conconditional repeal of the Sherman law than there ever was against elected, when the President was inaugurated, and when Congress met in extra session, there was a majority of both Houses

gress met in extra session, there was a majority of both Houses against the unconditional repeal of the Sherman law.

If that majority has been changed it has not been done in accordance with the theory and practice of rightful representation. It is the will of the majority of the people that the theory and principles of our Government require to find expression in legislation. Those Senators who oppose the unconditional repeal of the Sherman law believe it to be their sworn duty as Senators who in the state of the sherman law believe in the senators who is the senators where the senators who is the ators to act on their own convictions and in accordance with what they believe to be a large majority of their own constituents and of the whole people.

With these convictions of duty to ourselves and the good people we represent, after instructing them and employing all our ability in this protracted debate to satisfy them that the unconditional repeal of the Sherman law will surely leave the country on the gold basis, and putsilver out of the reach of use with gold on the gold basis, and putsilver out of the reach of use with gold as standard money, and without any more coinage except on an international agreement, and that existing indebtedness will be doubled and the means of payment reduced one-half, and other manifold consequences of the most ruinous character will follow unconditional repeal, how can such results be permitted as long as the power exists to prevent them? But it is said the people want the question settled. Certainly they do; but can it be possible that they are willing to accept a settlement that we have assured them and that they believe will result in their ruin? Is ruin preferable to the delay and the resistance that will solten from the dire consequences we have assured them will folthem from the dire consequences we have assured them will follow inevitably from the passage of the repeal bill?

Mr. President, knowing the anxiety of the people to see the Senate come to some reasonable and fairly just compromise that would secure a final vote of the majority, Democratic Senators, feeling their responsibility for legislation, united in the spiritof compromise and concession and fidelity to the Democratic party and selected an equal number of Senators from those friendly to unconditional repeal, and those opposed to unconditional repea and after a long time spent in consultation and with the full knowledge of President Cleveland and Secretary Carlisle that such effort was being made to bring Democratic Senators together upon some common ground that could be enacted into a law, accomplished their laudable undertaking so far as to agree upon a compromise that secured the signature of every Democratic Senator but six, and the fact is not considered doubtful that forty, three Democratic Senators would have senationed the that forty-three Democratic Senators would have sanctioned the compromise had not President Cleveland interposed his objection and demanded unconditional repeal at all hazards. Whatever others may say or believe, I am satisfied that all effort at compromise that would bring Democratic Senators together has failed solely on account of President Cleveland and his Secretary of the Treasury. Their will has been as potential and has served the same purpose as the cloture rule.

although the justification has increased.

The debate is about exhausted, and to make further opposition successful it would necessarily require a resort to extreme methods, which I believe to be constitutional and above the power of the Senate to override in making any change in its rules, but I have satisfied myself that I can not get a sufficient number of Senators to join me in the use of what is characterized as filibustering practice, and I am forced to record my vote against this diabolical measure and appeal to the people to organize their forces for the great battle of the future.

I am still willing, if I had sufficient support, to resort to any and all means left to defeat this iniquitous bill. It might be called dilburtary but two forces bills and de-called filibustering, but filibustering beat two force bills and defeated what was called the Mahone coalition. Was the majority in favor of the two force bills any less entitled to rule than the majority claimed for unconditional repeal? Was the majority for the execution of the Mahone coalition any less a majority with less right to rule than the alleged majority for the repeal bill? And yet all these majorities were prevented from ruling by filibustering, and in each instance filibustering was approved by the people.

Mr. President, I am proud of being called a filibuster in defeating a conspiracy equal in the ruinous consequences of its success to war, pestilence, and famine. I had rather be called a filibuster by the conspirators and lick-spittles of the gold kings than the called a traiter or a faithle state of the gold kings. than to be called a traitor or a faithless representative by the State and people who honored me with their trust and confidence. As for myself, I shall do my duty as a Senator as I understand it and leave consequences to God and my country.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, October 25, 1893.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. RUMSEY SMITESON, of Washington, D. C.
The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PAY OF DISCHARGED ENLISTED MEN.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Sector-General of the Army, with inclosures, relating to the payment of detained pay to discharged enlisted men; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 339) to authorize the Chattanooga Western Railroad Company to construct a bridge across Tennessee River, near Chattanooga; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows: To Mr. CAMINETTI, indefinitely, on account of important business

To Mr. Cockrell, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. Wright of Massachusetts, indefinitely, on account of important business.

LAND DISTRICTS IN CALIFORNIA.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill directing the Secretary of the Interior to make certain investiga-tions concerning consolidations of land districts in California, and for other purposes.

Whereas by a recent order of the Secretary of the Interior consolidating land districts, a reduction of one district was made in the State of California by the consolidation of the Independence land district with the Visalia land district; and

whereas there are in the former 11,000,000 acres of public lands subject to settlement, the bulk of which is situated on the eastern slope of the Sierra Nevada Mountains, while the office of the consolidated district is located on the western side of said mountains at Visalia, Cal.; and Whereas said mountains at this point are impassable for eight months of the year, except by a 1,500-mile trip by way of Reno, Nev., and Sacramento. Cal.: Therefore

Best enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to investigate the necessity for continuance of the Interior be directed to investigate the necessity for continuance of the Independence land district, and the advisability of making a reduction elsewhere in said State, and that after such investigation he take such action in the premises as will subserve the best interests of the Government as well as of the settlers in said State.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. CAMINETTI. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. Cop-FEEN] told me that he would withdraw his objection.

Mr. KILGORE. As I understand the circumstances of this se, the Secretary of the Interior consolidated certain land districts in California or somewhere in the West, and the purpose of the present bill is to have him reopen the matter and re-consider the grounds upon which that consolidation took place. Is that the situation of the case?

Mr. CAMINETTI. No, sir.

Mr. KILGORE. If it is, I am opposed to the bill, and will object to its immediate consideration.

Mr. CAMINETTI. The purpose of the bill is to correct an error. A consolidation was made of two districts in the State of California, one of them being on the eastern slope of the Sierra Nevada Mountains and the other upon the western slope. During eight months in the year it requires a trip of over thirteen hundred miles to enable settlers on the eastern slope to reach the main office of the consolidated district on the western slope. Now the purpose of the bill is to rectify this difficulty by making a reduction of one district somewhere else in the State, where less inconvenience, hardship, and expense will be imposed upon the

Mr. KILGORE. Can not this correction be made by the Secretary of the Interior if his attention is simply called to the mat-retary of the Interior If his attention is simply called to the matter, without any action by the House, which appears to interiere with his conduct in the management of his Department?

Mr. CAMINETTI. No, sir; if the difficulty could have been remedied in that way, I would not have put the House to the trouble of considering this bill.

Mr. KILGORE. Has there been any effort to do it?

Mr. CAMINETTI. Yes, sir.

Mr. KILGORE. And he has declined to take action in the matter?

Mr. CAMINETTI. He can not, because of the action of the last Congres hast Congress.

Mr. KILGORE. He can not make the necessary change?

Mr. CAMINETTI. No, sir; not without authority from Congress. It requires the passage of a new law upon the subject.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill? [A pause.] The Chair hears none.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. 4242) was read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CAMINETTI, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

REVISION OF THE TARIFF.

Mr. COOMBS. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Reselved, That the Committee on Ways and Means be requested to prepare and present for the consideration of this House a bill for the collection of revenue and other purposes, substantially upon the basis and principle of the following propositions:

The bill shall have four schedules, as follows:
Schedule A, to be composed of articles free of duty, including all raw materials necessary in the manufacture of goods.
Schedule B, to be composed of articles which by their nature should not pay a duty exceeding 10 per cont.
Schedule C, to be composed of articles, principally wine, spirits, tobacco. cigars, and cigarettes, upon which a duty must be charged sufficient at least to protect manufacturers, who pay a tax under our internal revenue laws. Also, of a few well-defined articles of luxury, which will bear a rate of at least 40 per cent ad valorem.

Schedule D, to be known as the schedule for the protection of labor, and thich shall be made up from time to time in the manner hereinafter specifield articles not covered by the preceding lists shall be grouped and known All articles not covered by the preceding lists shall be grouped and known as "unspecified" and shall have a uniform rate of advalorem duty, as pro-fied.

All articles not covered by the preceding lists shall be grouped and known as "unspecified" and shall have a uniform rate of ad valorem duty, as provided hereafter.
The bill shall also provide that as soon as Congress shall ascertain the amount of money necessary for the conduct of the Government for the current year it shall submit a report to the same, deducting therefrom the following items:

a. Surplus remaining over from preceding year.
b. Estimated income from Schedule B.
c. Estimated income from Schedule B.
d. Estimated income from Schedule B.
f. Estimated income from Schedule D.
f. Estimated income from all other sources.
Which amounts, being deducted from the amount to be provided for the expenses of the Government, will leave as a result the amount to be raised by import tax on all "unspecified" articles.

It shall, it is report to Congress, estimate the gross value of such importations for the current year, and the percentage of duty necessary to be levied on the same, in order, as near as may be, to realize the amount ascertained as above.

levied on the same, in order, as near as may be, to realize the amount ascertained as above.

The bill shall also provide that in case any manufacturer or manufacturers of goods or merchandise included in the class of "unspecified," shall find that the item of labor cost, including the use of machinery, of his productions in this country shall exceed that paid by the manufacturers of the same class of goods made inforeign countries, he may present sworn proofs of the same to the committee, with the demand that such articles shall be entered on schedule D. If, upon examination, the committee find that the statements are correct, or if they find that any difference exists in favor of the foreign manufacturer, they shall cause that article or class of articles to be entered upon schedule D, with a specific duty equal to such difference; always provided that the article is not protected by letters patent issued by this Government.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Let that resolution go to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to inquire whether this proposition is constitutional. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I should think this Democratic House could act on this resolution without sending it to a com-

RAILROAD, ETC., HOT SPRINGS RESERVATION.

Mr. GRESHAM, from the Committee on the Public Lands reported as a substitute for the bill H. R. 2806 a bill (H. R. 4243) granting the right of way for the construction of a railroad and other improvements through and on the Hot Springs Reservation, State of Arkansas; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The bill (H. R. 2806) of the same title will lie upon the table.

Mr. SOMERS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask permission during the day to submit two reports from the Committee on the Public Lands, which are not quite ready.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection that order will be made.

There was no objection.

CHARLES A. HALL.

Mr. SOMERS, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back in the nature of a substitute for the bill H. R. 1829 a bill (H. R. 4244) for the relief of Charles A. Hall; which was read a first and second time, referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

House bill No. 1829 was laid on the table.

BUSINESS IN THE MORNING HOUR.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at fifteen minutes ast 12 o'clock. The call rests with the Committee on the Public ast 12 o'clock.

There is a question of order raised and pending. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE], chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands, calls up for consideration a bill (H. R. 119), which had heretofore been called up under the morning hour and had its consideration for two hours under the rule. The question is raised against the bill that under the rule, providing the second morning hour or consideration hour, it is not the privilege of a committee to call up in this hour any bill which has been reported by the committee and which has already had the two hours' consideration specified by the rule. The Chair will read

4. After the morning hour shall have been devoted to reports from committees (or the call completed), the Speaker shall again call the committees in regular order for one hour, upon which call each committee, on being named, shall have the right to call up for consideration any bill reported by it on a previous day. And whenever any committee shall have occupied the said hour for one day, it shall not be in order for such committee to designate any other proposition for consideration until all the other committees shall have been called in their turn; and when any proposition shall have occupied two hours on this call, it shall thereafter remain on the Calendar as unfinished business and be taken up in its order.

The Chair has had some difficulty in determining exactly what was the proper construction of that rule, but, after such examination as the Chair has been able to give to it, is of opinion that the power of the committee to call up any bill reported by it on a previous day is not limited or taken away by the fact that they have once called it up and that it has had its consideration for the two hours specified in the rule.

The practice, as the Chair understands it, is expressed in the Digest for the second session of the last Congress, on page 384:

A bill having been considered in this hour on two days takes precedence on the Calendars as unfinished business, according to the provisions of clause 5 of Rule XXIV, or, if the committee presenting it so elect, they may again present it for consideration during the consideration hour when that committee is again called in its turn.

Now the suggestion is made that this construction of the rule may operate badly. Of course that suggestion would have force, and does have force, when a rule is subject to two constructions; and the Chair is frank to say that this rule is not perfectly clear. Yet it seems to the Chair that the practice just stated is more consistent with the language of the rule than any other; and the Chair does not see that this practice, as thus suggested, could ever interfere with the right of the committees or the orderly business of the House.

Mr. DINGLEY. If the Chair will pardon me, does the Chair intend to hold that a bill that has been considered for two hours under the rule in the morning hour, and becomes a part of the unfinished business of the House, may not only be called up for further consideration in the morning hour, but has also the privilege belonging to unfinished business on the Calendar, and in that position obtains priority over other business which that that position obtains priority over other business which that status gives to it?

The SPEAKER. There are two kinds of unfinished business under the rule. There is a kind of business which is denominated unfinished business in which the House was engaged at the time of adjournment. There is another kind of unfinished business. Under this rule there seems to be a difference as to the character of the unfinished business. Clause 5 of the same rule, to which the Chair has just referred, provides as follows:

After the hour under the preceding clause

That is, for consideration-shall have been occupied, it shall be in order to proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business in which the House may have been engaged at an adjournment, and at the same time each day thereafter, other than the first and third Mondays, until disposed of—

That is one kind of unfinished business-and it shall be in order to proceed to the consideration of all other unfinished business whenever the class of business to which it belongs shall be in

Mr. DINGLEY. My inquiry addressed to the Chair is this: Supposing under the rule as amended at the beginning of this session, which allowed private bills to come into the morning suppose a bill has been considered for two hours in the hour—suppose a bill has been considered for two hours in the consideration hour under the rule, then it goes to the Calendar as unfinished business. Now, on Friday, the day when private business is under consideration, if it is placed on the Calendar of Unfinished Business, would not such bill under the rule be the first business in order on private bill day, and thus obtain a position at the head of the Calendar by virtue of being unfinished business in the morning hour, and also have the right of way of consideration over and above all other business, if the rule is to be construed as indicated by the Chair?

The SPEAKER. That is a question of great importance, about which the Chair is not clear; but the Chair is frank to say to the gentleman from Maine that his own opinion is that clause 4 of this rule, under which matters are called up in the morning hour, ought to be amended by striking out from it the words "as unfinished business;" so that the rule would read:

Shall thereafter remain on the Calendar and be taken up in its order.

Mr. DINGLEY. That would obviate the difficulty I have suggested.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks those words ought to be stricken out, so that the mere fact that a bill had been considered in the morning hour would not put it upon the Calendar of Unfinished Business, but that it would remain on the Calendar precisely as though it had not been called up.

Mr. DINGLEY. It seems that that amendment is absolutely necessary, if the ruling the Speaker has indicated is to be made. Otherwise it would seem at a glance that private bills that have received consideration in the morning hour are given a very unfair advantage over all other private bills.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that was not contemplated, and will call the attention of the Committee on Rules to those

Now, so far as the object of the rule is concerned, of course we all understand that it was supposed it would enable committees during the morning hour to call up matters which were not hotly contested, and in that way to relieve the committee of those measures. ures; but at the same time, if a committee chooses to call up a measure which is resisted on the floor, the result will simply be that the committee will not pass anything. Take the bill that was before the House when this committee was called. It is in Committee of the Whole, and if it is resisted we all know that it is impossible within an hour or two hours to get a bill out of the Committee of the Whole; so that the practical effect will be that a committee which chooses to call up a measure that is re-

Mr. DINGLEY. Right in the line of the suggestion which the Chair has already made, in the furtherance of public bush ness, it does seem to me that with the amendment which the Chair has just suggested, which is desirable, there should also be another amendment, restricting the business to be considered in the morning hour to that of a public nature, which was the original intention of the rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] of course, understands—because he is very familiar with the rules—that that change in the rules was purely experimental. Never until this Congress was the power given to call up a private bill in this morning hour.

Mr. DINGLEY. That is true.

The SPEAKER. And the limitation was only taken off in this Congress in an experimental way, to see how it would operate. It was felt by a good many members that there were a number of small private bills which members seek every morning to have considered by unanimous consent which might be disposed of in this way, and that by giving this right the Committees on Claims, on War Claims, and on Invalid Pensions might call up pension bills and other measures and get them considered in that way. Of course, if this morning hour is used to call up private bills that are stoutly resisted, the result will be that the committee which calls them up will get nothing done. committee which calls them up will get nothing done.

Mr. DINGLEY. I merely wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that our experience so far has shown that the hour is not used for that purpose, and it seems to me, in view of the line which the Speaker has suggested, that the rule should now be put back where it has been up to the present Congress since the Forty-ninth Congress, limiting it to business of a public nature.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will call the attention of the committee to the fact.

Mr. DOCKERY. Would it be in order to request unanimous consent to strike out the words "as unfinished business," as suggested by the Speakers.

gested by the Speaker?
The SPEAKER. The Chair has no objection at all to submitting that question to the House. It has not been called to the attention of the committee. The Chair will say to the gentleman that there was a call issued for a meeting of the committee this morning, but for some reason there was no quorum.
Mr. DOCKERY. Very well; I will withhold the request.
The SPEAKER. The Chair will call attention to it as soon as a quorum of the committee can be obtained. The call rests with the Committee on Public Lands.

PROTECTION OF FOREST RESERVATIONS.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 119) to protect forest reservations.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I raise the question of consideration · against this bill.

The SPEAKER. The SPEAKER. That can be done by voting down the mo-tion to go into Committee of the Whole. The bill is in Commit-tee of the Whole. The Clerk will report the title of the bill. The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 119) to protect forest reservations.

The SPEAKER. This bill is in Committee of the Whole.
Mr. McRAE. Instead of moving the consideration of the bill in Committee of the Whole, I will ask that after the consideration of the bankruptcy bill is disposed of, this bill be taken up under an ordersimilar to that under which the bankruptcy bill is being considered, so that we can have all the time that is necessary to its consideration.

that that be done?

Mr. MCRAE.

Mr. McRAE. Yes.
Mr. DOOLITTLE. I object.
Mr. McRAE. Then I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of this measure.
The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. DOOLITTLE] that the way to defeat the consideration is to vote down this motion.
Mr. McRAE. Pending my motion, I move to limit debate on the pending paragraph to five minutes.
Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will not propose to limit the debate to five minutes. There are some very important propositions to be considered.

Mr. McRAE. I understand.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that general debata has not been closed.

Mr. PAYNE. I move that the debate be limited to thirty

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the question. The gentleman from Arkansas moves that the House resolve itself nto Committee of the Whole House for the further consideration of the bill the title of which has been read, and pending that motion the gentleman from Arkansas also moves that all debate upon the pending paragraph be limited to five minutes, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] moves to amend the motion of the gentleman from Arkansas by inserting thirty minutes man from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE].

Mr. MCRAE. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman has stated that the bill is now being considered under the five-minute rule in committee, and that general debate has been closed. Now, under clause 6 of Rule XXIII, the committee has authority to close debate after the five minutes' debate has begun, so that the House has given the jurisdiction of this subject to the committee.

The SPEAKER. What is the number of the rule?

Mr. SPRINGER. Clause 6 of Rule XXIII. The rule says.

Mr. SPRINGER. Clause 6 of Rule XXIII. The rule says:

The committee may, by a vote of a majority of the members present, at any time after the five minutes' debate has begun upon proposed amendments to any section or paragraph to a bill, close all debate upon such section or paragraph, or, at its election, upon the pending amendments only (which motion shall be decided without debate); but this shall not preclude further amendment, to be decided without debate.

The SPEAKER. The point of the gentleman from Illinois is that this right is exclusively in the committee?

Mr. SPRINGER. It is, that by conferring this power upon the committee the House can not limit the committee's right to exercise it. As soon as the House resolves itself into Committee of the Whole, it can go to work and dispose of this subject in the committee; and, the committee having been clothed with this jurisdiction, it deprives the House of the jurisdiction to otherwise dispose of the matter. The right to close general debate is still with the House; but after general debate has been closed the committee must have the right to dispose of their business. That is a new jurisdiction given to the committee by the rules of this House that has not heretofore been exercised.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, the committee is the creature of the House, and while the House gives to the committee the right to limit debate in committee, it does not lose any of its own power and control of the committee and over debate in the The House still has power to limit and control decommittee.

bate, and control it in committee.

Mr. SPRINGER. But you can not do it against a rule of the House.

Mr. PAYNE. It is not against a rule of the House.
Mr. SPRINGER. Here is the rule, which says you give the committee the right to control debate.

Mr. PAYNE. There is no rule that takes away from the House the power to control the Committee of the Whole.
Mr. SPRINGER. Clause 6 of Rule XXIII provides that the committee shall have the power to close debate.

committee shall have the power to close debate.

Mr. PAYNE. And another objection remains, that the point of order comes too late while the House was dividing.

The SPEAKER. Of course this is a very important matter, but it does not occur to the Chair that granting the right to the committee to limit debate takes away from the House the right to limit debate

Mr. SPRINGER. Can you take away the right from the committee while this rule exists?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Is not than the Committee of the Whole? Is not the House more powerful

Mr. SPRINGER. Notwhen the rules of the House have prescribed the line of action. The rules govern, and you cannot get rid of this limitation upon the action of the House without changing the rule.

The SPEAKER. The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. The Chair thinks the fact that the right to limit debate is given to the Committee of the Whole does not take that right away from the House. A committee has a right to report a bill, yet the House may direct the committee to report the bill or to report it in a given way.

It does not occur to the Chair that this rule takes away the right from the House to limit debate; and when the House exercises that right, it is not in the power of the committee to do anything in conflict with it. It does not seem to the Chair that this rule confers upon the committee an exclusive right to limit debate; it confers only the privilege of doing so, and does not take away from the House its right in the premises.

The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE] demands the yeas

Mr. McRAE. I withdraw that demand, Mr. Speaker.
The SPEAKER. The demand for the yeas and nays is withdrawn. The tellers will take their places. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] to limit debate on the pending paragraph to forty-five minutes.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 11, noes 89; so the motion was rejected.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. BAILEY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, a joint resolution (H. Res. 66) that the acknowledgments of the Government and people of the United States be tendered to various foreign governments of the world who have participated in commemoration of the discovery of America by Christopher Columbus; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

THE BANKRUPTCY BILL.

The committee again resumed its session (Mr. OUTHWAITE in the chair)

Mr. COOMBS. Mr. Chairman, coming as I do from a com-mercial community, and representing more or less the commercial spirit of that community, it will probably be expected of me that I shall express some views upon the pending bill.

The merchants as a general thing are in favor of a bankruptcy law. The principle underlying it is this, that every creditor, having contributed to the assets of the debtor, is entitled to a pro rata share of those assets in case the debtor becomes insolvent. The merchant in that case, when he avails himself of the bankruptcy law, consents that the debtor, having surrendered all of his property, should, if he has been honest, have another chance to enter into business free from legal obligations

I shall confine myself to a general expression of opinion upon the question of national bankruptcy legislation. I am not sure that this bill fairly meets all the necessary conditions, and avoids the errors of previous legislation of the same character. the errors of previous legislation of the same character. Discussion of its provisions by those of you who are versed in the law will doubtless discover defects. Neither shall I assume that this is the most favorable time in which to put such a measure into operation. I should probably not have spoken at all had I not wished to reply to what I consider unwise and unjust assaults upon the creditor class in some of the addresses made to the

No man who has been familiar with the practical working of bankruptcy laws in the past can fail to see that the balance of advantages is in favor of the debtor; that the law is really more humane toward the debtor than toward the creditor. I consequently have been amazed at the assaults that have been made on the principle involved in this bill and the assumption that it is particularly oppressive to the debtor. It would seem from some of the impassioned addresses that have been made in this House to be almost criminal to be a creditor; that the creditor has no rights that the debtor is bound to respect. I hope that Congress will never become impregnated with that idea.

It is subversive of all credit, subversive of that great system under which we all live, and upon which business throughout the world thrives. When the weight and influence of important members of this body are thrown entirely in the interest of the debtor class, ignoring the rights of the creditor class, and countdebtor class, ignoring the rights of the creditor class, and couring them as Pariahs, they do a very unwise and unjust thing. It is the duty of the Congress of the United States to uphold honesty, honesty in its own administration of government, honesty in its currency, and honesty in the relations of man toward

In looking over the provisions of this law as to who shall be made involuntary bankrupts, it strikes me that it is very moderate indeed, and thoroughly protects the interests of the solvent debtor. Who can be declared an insolvent debtor?

(1) A man who has concealed himself, who has run away

Can there be a doubt of his insolvency, or that his creditors' interests need looking after-

(2) failed for thirty days while insolvent to secure the release of any property levied upon under process of law for 8500 or over, or if such property is to be sold under such process, then until three days before the time fixed for such sale, and until a petition is filed; (3) made a transfer of any of his property with intent to defeat his creditors—

Mr. RAY. In order that I may not interrupt the gentleman in the course of his remarks, I would like to ask this: Would you favor any provision which made it possible to throw a man into bankruptcy because he had committed one of those acts three or bankruptcy because he had committed one of those acts three or four months before the filing of the petition, provided the act had been remedied in its effect before action was taken?

Mr. COOMBS. No. I would not. Referring to clause 2—
Mr. RAY. Then you would favor an amendment that would make that perfectly clear?

Mr. COOMBS. I will cover that point before I get through.

The other acts of bankruptcy are as follows:

(4) made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors or filed in court a written statement admitting his inability to pay his debts—

Certainly that man is a bankrupt by his own confession-(5) made while insolvent a contract personally, or by agent, for the purchase or sale of a commodity with intent not to receive or deliver the same, but merely to receive or pay a difference between the contract and the market price thereof, at a time subsequent to the making of such contract;—

This I do not agree with. It is not an act indicative of bankruptcy and should be stricken out. There is too much of the flavor of antioption about it, and it is entirely foreign to the purposes of the bill. It is possibly expecting too much to hope that some of these Alliance heresies shall not find their way into nearly all the legislation in a Congress constituted as ours is-(6) made while insolvent, a transfer of any of his property or suffered any of it to be taken or levied upon by process of law or otherwise for the purpose of giving a preference—

Certainly that man is trying to defeat the just rights of some of his creditors in the interests of favored creditors.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. May I ask the gentleman a question right there? Mr. COOMBS.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. By the sixth paragraph of section 2 it is made an act of bankruptcy for a man, while insolvent, to transfer any part of his property for the purpose of giving a preference. Mr. COOMBS.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Now, under the laws of nearly all of the States preference is given to all debts for labor. In fact, that preference is also given in this act.

Mr. COOMBS. Yes.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. And yet if a man, while insolvent, should pay a laborer's claim in full, that would be an act in bankruptcy?

I do not think it could be so interpreted un-Mr. COOMBS. der this law, but still I wish to say here that I am not a lawyer and that the legal points of this matter, to carry out the main principle, must be determined by you—

(7) procured or suffered a judgment to be entered against himself with in-

That is, if he has become a party to a judgment against himself. Certainly that is wronging the other creditors—

(8) secreted any of his property to avoid its being levied upon under legal process against himself and to defeat his creditors—

Certainly that should be a cause of action-(9) suffered while insolvent an execution for $500 or over, or a number of executions aggregating such amount, against himself to be returned no property found, unless the amount shown to be due by such executions shall be paid before a petition is filed—

Certainly there is prima facie evidence of insolvency. Mr. KYLE. Will you allow me to ask you a question right there?

Mr. COOMBS. Yes.

Mr. COOMBS. Yes.

Mr. KYLE. Suppose an execution is returned nulla bona, and a bankrupt law permits a man to retain his exemptions, how are you going to get anything by putting him into bankruptey?

Mr. COOMBS. That is a question of policy that the creditor must consider—if there be a defect. I must leave it for you lawyers to settle among yourselves.

Mr. BOATNER. I will suggest an answer, if the gentleman will allow me.

Mr. COOMBS.

Mr. COOMBS. Cortainly.
Mr. BOATNER. It not infrequently happens that a man goes off and buys a stock of goods, or otherwise comes in possession of property which he converts into cash and puts it into his pocket, and then he tells the creditors to sing for their money.
There ought to be some means—and means are provided by this law—for bringing that man into court and making him show what he has down with that money. what he has done with that money.

points.

Now, the tenth act of bankruptcy is as follows:

or (10) suspended and not resumed for thirty days and until a petition is filed, while insolvent, the payment of his commercial paper for or aggregating $500 or over.

I think that the time of that should be extended. Peculiar conditions can exist whereby a man may, for thirty days, be unable to meet his obligations, and at the same time not be insolvent. But, nevertheless, the man is prima facis insolvent and the creditor certainly has some rights to look after his interest. We have disposed, I think, of one side of this question and reclted the various acts for the doing of which a man may be declared insolvent and forced into bankruptey. They all, with the exception of one, seem to be good. The other is simply a bid to the Farmers' Alliance interest of the country, and should be stricken out of the bill. It is undignified and does not constitute bankruptey. There is no reason why it should be there, and it should be taken out, and I hope an amendment will be made to that effect. made to that effect.

Now, let us turn to the other side of the question. Who may become voluntary bankrupts; and here is the humane side:

Any person who owes debts, except a corporation, shall be entitled to the eneits of this act as a voluntary bankrupt.

In these two lines provision is made to strike off the shackles In these two lines provision is made to strike out the shackles from the limbs of tens of thousands of embarrassed men in this country who to-day are unable to do business; many of whom have failed honestly; who, on account of the peculiar conditions of the money market or of business or through faults of others have become bankrupts. I have many such among my acquaintances who are bound hand and foot by the results of business misfortunes, but who, if released, with added experience would become safe business men. It would doubtless release also many depresses men and provision should be made as far as possidangerous men, and provision should be made, as far as possible, to exclude those who have made scandalous failures from the benign provisions of this section.

I have heard no protests from creditor merchants against this provision for the legal discharge of their unfortunate debtors. The fact that this House is not flooded with protests should be a sufficient answer to the violent attacks upon the creditor class made by gentlemen who have addressed us.

The real merchant is a generous and farseeing man; he takes no pleasure in witnessing the torture of the helpless, and is always ready to give the helping hand to the competent and deserving. This hardly tallies with the description as given by some of the gentlemen who have preceded me, who have spoken of him as a roaring lion going about seeking whom he may deserve tearing and reading regardless of consequences. If anythere your, tearing and rending regardless of consequences. [Laughter]. I have been a merchant for forty years and I can not re-member a case in which a merchant has deliberately attempted to ruin a debtor who showed any honest intention to pay his debts. The merchant is anxious that his customer shall remain solvent and continue to be his customer, and will not avail himself of the provisions of this act, if it should become a law, unless he should see evidences of dishonesty, or that other creditors were likely to get an undue share of the debtor's estate. The gentleman who last spoke says that a discharged by a bankruptcy court brings disgrace to the discharged debtor. Does he prefer to have him remain always in bondage? And does the fact that he is legally discharged prevent him from redeeming his good name by a subsequent payment of the obligations from which he was released? The tenor of the gentleman sremarks would lead us to suppose that there is no dishonor involved in the nonpayment of debts, while it is an unpardonable offense to attempt to collect them.

Mr. BOATNER. If the gentleman will permit me, I would suggest that there can be no possible dishonor in it, because his certificate is not only a certificate of discharge, but it is a certificate that he has honestly surrendered all his property subject to the payment of his debts, except that which the law allows him to retain for the use of his family.

Mr. COOMBS. That is a good suggestion.

Now, we come to the point as to who are exempt from the operation of the bankrupt law, and here we find what I am afraid is another bid to the Farmers' Alliance. I am perfectly content that the exemption should be made, but wish to take advantage of the opportunity to rebuke what I consider to be an unwise tendency on the part of some of our political friends.

SEC. 3. A person engaged chiefly in farming or the tillage of the soil

While I agree that for obvious reasons they should be exempt from the operation of a national bankrupt law, I can not too strongly condemn the new political cry that they are exempt from the obligation that every other trade or profession is under, to pay their debts. They themselves have never made this claim, and I am sure that those who seek their votes or influence by claiming it for them will awake some day to the fact that they have made a mistake. The American farmer is an honest man, and is willing to take his place alongside of the rest of man-kind and meet his obligations. Politicians are trying to put strange theories into their heads and to debauch them, to claim for them more than they claim for themselves. It is the part of patriotism and plainly in the line of duty of gentlemen, who by their position are leaders of the people, to combat these false theories, and not seek their own advantage and safety in truck-ling to them. If this course is pursued you will keep them honest; if you keep suggesting these things you will make them dishonest

Mr. RAY. May I interrupt the gentleman there?
Mr. COOMBS. Certainly.
Mr. RAY. I can hardly agree with the gentleman when he

Mr. RAY. I can hardly agree with the gentleman when he says it is not necessary for the farmers in this country, as a rule, to run in debt during the season?

Mr. COOMBS. I did not say that.

Mr. RAY. I understood you to say so.

Mr. BOATNER. If the gentleman will permit an interruption, I will say that the object of excepting the farmers as a class from the involuntary feature of the law is that bankruptcy is applied principally to traders because of the personal character of the property in which they deal. The property of the farmer, on the contrary, consists principally in real estate and permanent fixtures, the incumbrances upon which are shown by the public records of his county, so that the merchant or dealer has a much better basis for ascertaining his financial status when the question arises of giving him credit. In addition to that, the proption arises of giving him credit. In addition to that, the property of the farmer may be reached by the ordinary courts of the country without any necessity for the interposition of bankruptcy proceeding in order to compel him to discharge his obligations if he does not do it voluntarily. For these reasons it was deemed unnecessary to subject farmers as a class to the operations of the inventors of the inventor tion of the involuntary features of this bill

Mr. COOMBS. I accept that as the explanation and the reason of that part of the bill. In what I said about the farmers, I was only anxious to defend them from the constant attempts that are made in this House to make them dishonest. The farmer can be furthermore exempted upon the ground that his debts are generally local debts in his State, whereas the merchant gives generally local debts in his State, whereas the incremate growth or credit throughout the country.

Mr. RAY. Not only are the farmer's debts generally local in his State, but they are usually confined to his own town or county.

Mr. COOMBS. Yes.

Mr. Chairman, the member who last addressed the House spoke of the hardship caused to the debtor in that it deprived him and his family of the exemptions granted to him by the laws of the various States. If he will look at section 5a he will find

This actaball not affect the allowance to bankrupts of the exemptions which are prescribed by the State laws in force at the time of filing the petition in the State wherein the adjudication is made.

I should think that this would effectually dispose of that objection.

Now, as I said incidentally a few moments ago, the debtor is a creditor, and the creditor is at the same time a debtor. They are woven together in this great commercial fabric. If you weaken one you weaken the other. If you take away from the creditor the right to collect his debt, you take away his ability to pay the man to whom he is in debt. If youdestroy confidence between man and man by making it legal for one man to shield himself from the payment of his just debt, you induce the withdrawal of credit on the part of the other man, and you weaken drawal of credit on the part of the other man, and you weaken

Before closing my remarks I wish in the most emphatic manner to enter my protest against the persistent attempts that are made in this House to array the debtor against the creditor classes of the country. In our system of doing business the one is necessary to the other, and their interests are the same in sustaining the credit system. It can not be sustained if many of the theories the credit system. It can not be sustained if many of the theories that are here advanced with so much vehemence come to be practically acted upon by the people. Do they forget that it is the growth of centuries, and that it is a distinctive indication of our advance in civilization? Do they reflect how much of our prosperity would disappear were confidence in it destroyed or undermined?

The whole commercial world in modern times moves on this line, without it the majority of commercial transactions could not be effected. Destroy confidence and credit and you deal a deathblow to modern progress. How wicked then is the attempt to weaken in the debtor class his sense of obligation for deathblow to modern progress. How wicked then is the attempt to weaken in the debtor class his sense of obligation for the fulfillment of his contracts, to teach him that in meeting his just debts he is doing himself an injustice and submitting to oppression. No political necessity can excuse or palliate it.

I hope that I may be excused if in illustration of the extent to which confidence and credit have to do with the business of the world, I give some of my business experiences.

My business as a merchant has brought me into contact with every nation and people in the world. I have had transactions with the people of Europe, Asia, and Africa, Central and South America, and in every market of the world I have given credit on the basis of confidence and character. The aggregate of such credits would amount to many millions of dollars, many, yes, most of them in countries where no recovery could be made under the law. The result of it all has been that I have learned to believe that honesty is the rule and dishonesty the rare exception. The lowes from dishonesty in all these years has not amounted to one-sixteenth of 1 per cent on the sum of the transactions.

In the course of my business I have received thousands of bills of exchange drawn in various lands upon this and European countries. They were simple pieces of paper, and when they came into my hands bore only the responsibility of the drawer; zet I never lost a dollar upon one of them. They were always and either by the party upon whom they were always and either by the party upon whom they were always and the proper of the drawer and the start of the course of the drawer and the party was a whom they were always and the proper of the drawer and the party was a whom they were always and the party was a whom they were always and the party was a whom they were always and the party was a whom they were always and the party was a whom they were always and the party was a whom they were always and the party was a whom they were always and the party was a whom came into my hands bore only the responsibility of the drawer; get I never lost a dollar upon one of them. They were always paid either by the party upon whom they were drawn or by the drawer or by the party who sent them to me. Bankers in the financial centers buy and sell exchange upon a margin of a fraction of 1 per cent. Do gentlemen think it wise or patriotic to change this order of things and in its place put dishonesty and distrust? Let Congress set the example of honesty in dealing with the obligations of the nation, and let our statesmen cease making suggestions of dishonesty to the people.

In closing, Mr. Chairman, I wish to repeat that I am in favor of a just bankrupt law, because it is right that all creditors should share prorate in the estate toward which they have contributed. I am also in favor of it because it releases the honest tributed. I am also in favor of it because it releases the honest man, who surrenders everything to his creditors, condones his lack of business judgment, and enables him, in the interest of his family, to start again in the world.

As to the legal provisions of this bill I can not speak. If it accomplishes the purposes I have described, I favor it. When it comes up under the five-minute rule these matters of legal practice will undoubtedly be thoroughly examined by experienced lawyers. But as to the principles of the measure—as being humane toward the debtor and best for the commercial interests of the community—I have no doubts. [Applause.]

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Chairman, I do not think I amasking too much when I bespeak the indulgence of the committee while I discuss in my own way, and in my own time, the provisions of the cuss in my own way, and in my own time, the provisions of the pending bill. No member of the House has taken more interest in this measure, nor been more active than I in opposition to came to a vote it would pass by a considerable majority, and the only way to accomplish its defeat was to prevent a vote by the use of obstructive tactics. The minority were of opinion that the enactment of such a measure would be productive of infinite harm to the mass of people of our country, so we did not hesitate to use all the means and employ all the methods known to par-liamentary jurisprudence to hinder its passage through the

We considered that the magnitude of the interest involved, together with the fact that there had been no expression of opinion from the great body of the people in favor of such a measure, justified the minority in obstructing, in every legitimate manner, its passage. It devolved on me, by chance perhaps, mate manner, its passage. It devolved on me, by chance perhaps, to lead the minority in that contest. In defeating the measure we shouldered all the responsibility—assumed all the burdens which the gravity of the occasion and the importance the work imported.

There had been no discussion of the measure among the people; no demand for its passage by those whose interest it most deeply affected. We were absolutely without any guide except an abiding conviction that it was a most dangerous and pernicious measure, fraught with unnumbered ills to the people, and an abiding confidence in our knowledge of the condition, the wants, and the interest of the masses. On these lines we made the fight, and the interest of the masses. On these lines we made the light, and faltered not till we won the victory.

For the part which some of us performed in that contest we were assailed without mercy and without stint by the great papers of the cities speaking for a metropolitan people who control the vast aggregated wealth of the country. I have never complained of these attacks, nor replied to them, and it is not my purpose to do so now; but they did not scruple to misrepresent and ridicule and malign and traduce me for my fidelity to my people and to my convictions.

cule and malign and traduce me formy fidelity to my people and to my convictions.

The writers for these papers never studied the provisions of the bill; they did not know what was in it, nor did they care. They did know that it was originated by and devised in the interest of the wealthy wholesale dealer to the end that he might harrass, oppress, and blackmail and destroy, at his own sweet will, the host of small traders throughout the length and breadth of the land. They did not know that it was full of conspicuous and flagrant incongruities which left its interpretation to officiels whose years position made them unfriendly to the small cials whose very position made them unfriendly to the small debtor in a contest with his wealthy creditors.

They did not know that it carried in its body the elements and the spirit of a most vicious paternalism, that it bristled with harsh and inhuman remedies in the interest of the creditor, and cruel and unusual penalties against a debtor who may have been guilty of no greater crime than mere misfortune.

They did not know that it transcended the limits of free government, and would precipitate widespread and unmeasured harm upon the most numerous class of the plain people of the

If these great papers had known all these things about this measure it would not have wrought any change in their course. Their servile and mercenary devotion to the aristocracy of aggregated wealth control their convictions and their opinions and their judgment on all questions which are supposed to imperil the pecuniary interest of this gilded aristocracy. Patriotism— a regard for the principles of free government and constitutional liberty and for the interest of the great mass of the people—exercise no influence with the metropolitan press when they conflict with the private interest and private fortune of the favored

Notwithstanding the abuse and criticism which the "big dallies" of the cities have chosen to mete out to the opponents of this measure, I have not changed my mind in the least on the sub-ject and I have not abated a single jot or tittle of my opposition to the bill. The more I have investigated its provisions, the more I have comprehended its meaning and purpose, the stronger has become my conviction that it is entirely vile and bad. It can be safely asserted in this Hall and outside of it that any measure which has the constant, watchful care and attention of the lobby has behind it some improper motive and is generally loaded with some scheme, the purpose of which is to subserve the interest of only a limited class of selfish people.

One of the strongest objections to this bill is that it has been pushed from the time it went on the Calendar in the Fifty-first Congress by a shrewd, able, insidious, and assiduous and persistent lobby.

Congress has the authority under the Constitution to enact a use in my own way, and in my own time, the provisions of the ending bill. No member of the House has taken more interest a this measure, nor been more active than I in opposition to be passage.

In the Fifty-second Congress it was well understood if the bill

Congress has the authority under the Constitution to enact a uniform system of baskrupt laws and has done so on three occasions in our history. But it is not a character of legislation which the people of this country are inclined to favor. They have only been resorted to after periods of great depression in trade and commerce, following widespread commercial disaster which has swept down unfortunate debtors in all parts of the country

Mr. BOATNER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KILGORE. Yes, sir, with pleasure.
Mr. BOATNER. This matter of a bankrupt bill has been before the country now for the last four years. Has the gentleman observed any decided opposition to the measure; and if so, from what quarters, so far as he has observed, has the principal opposition come—from what class of people and from what section?

Mr. KILGORE. The great mass of the people whose interest would be most seriously endangered by this measure, if not ruined, do not have the opportunity to investigate and discuss such a measure, and they are slow in giving expression to their opinion about it. I venture to say no man has ever yet seen a full and fair analysis of this bill, and a candid discussion of its provisions, in any of the daily papers which have been demanding its passage. I can inform the gentleman from Louisiana in whose interest the bill is framed and who has been demanding It is intended for the use and benefit of the great its enactment. wholesale merchant, and the great mass of the people would be apt to be found on the other side, for what these creditors de-mand would not tend to promote the interest of the small debtor

Mr. BOATNER. Does the gentleman from Texas refer to the farmers as a class who would be ruined by the passage of the

Mr. KILGORE. Well, sir, I will specify as I go on. I do not wish to be anticipated, though I am perfectly willing to be in-

As I said before, this kind of legislation is not in high favor ith our people. The Government has been in existence a little with our people. more than one hundred years; and during about fifteen years of that period bankrupt laws have been in force in this country

The first such ever passed by Congress was enacted in 1800 and repealed in 1803. It remained on the statute books a little over three years and was repealed long before the limitation on its existence had expired. The next act was passed in 1841 and went into effect on the 1st of February, 1842. This was repealed on the 3d day of March, 1843, remaining in force only about thirteen months. The next law was passed in 1867 and it endured bout elever was passed in 1867 and it endured the status of the second of the sec about eleven years. It was several times amended and it demised in 1878 by repeal.

The contention on each occasion was that they were enacted in the interest of the debtor class. That was the moving purpose, the inspiration for this character of legislation. The prepose, the inspiration for this character of legislation. The pretense for its enactment was that the law was in the interest of the debtor, and that was the truth; because they were enacted right after a great financial storm had swept over the country and many people had been overthrown by the commercial upheaval and depression of the times, and it was in their interest as much or more than in the interest of the creditor class that these bills were passed. They were passed to meet an emergency which existed in the country at the time just prior to the enactment of these laws. There is no such emergency now. This is not a bill in the interest of the creditor.

Bankrupt laws, Mr. Chairman, have been in existence for about three hundred and fifty years in England. In the thirty-fourth and thirty-fifth years of the reign of Henry VIII, about three hundred and fifty years ago, the British Parliament passed the first bankruptcy law known to English jurisprudence; and I will call the attention of this committee and the advocates of this bill to what Mr. Robson says in his work on the law and practice of bankruptcy in England on this subject. I quote his event language: exact language:

The first introduction of the bankrupt law was by the statute 34 and 35 Henry VIII, c. 4, which was directed against debtors, whether traders or not, who sought fraudulently to evade the payment of their debts, or, as it was expressed in the act, "who craftly obtaining into their hands great substance of other men's goods do suddenly fice to parts unknown or keep their house, not minding to pay, or return to pay, any of their creditors their debts and duties, but at their own wills and pleasures consume the substance obtained by credit from other men for their own pleasure and delicate living against all reason, equity, and good conscience." (Robson's Law and Practice in Bankruptcy, sixth edition.)

That was one of the principal provisions in the first bankruptcy law that was known, as I say, to English jurisprudence. At the time of the passage of that law, and for centuries afterwards, an insolvent debtor was treated as a criminal in that country and in this. He was deprived of his liberty without the benefit of bail, unless the bail carried with it the security for his debts to ball, unless the ball carried with it the security for his debts to the satisfaction of his creditors.

Now, the world has learned a good deal since then. It has progressed in the direction of humanity and of enlightenment. The progress which the world has made in three hundred and fifty years and its advance in enlightenment has taken away much of the asperities and harshness with which creditors have heretofore been treated. The heartlessness and cruelty of creditors to their debtors was exemplified by the miseries of the debtors' prisons, which, happily, no longer exist among English-speaking people. This bill, if it becomes a law, would signalize a return to some of the atrocities which were meted out to debt. ors in the olden time. Most people seem to understand that man ors in the olden time. Most people seem to understand that man may become insolvent or lose his property without any fault of his own or criminality on his part. Men become insolvent without the commission of a crime in these days. Everybody seems to have learned that fact, except the author and abettors of the Torrey bankruptcy bill. The language of the acts of three hundred and fifty years ago, passed by the British Parliament, stripped of the quaintness which belonged to the language of that remote period, is in harmony with a portion of the Torrey that remote period, is in harmony with a portion of the Torrey bill and of the grounds on which it seeks to put an unfortu-nate debtor into a court of bankruptcy in which his honor, his credit, and his property are wrecked.

I say, Mr. Chairman, that the world has progressed on that subject. It has come to the conclusion that the debtor has rights; and on that theory and upon that principle the bankrupt laws of this country have heretofore been enacted even though they contain provisions for an involuntary system of bankruptcy. Now, I assert the conditions do not exist which justify a bank-rupt law. There has been no great commercial panic or cyclone sweeping throughout the country and carrying down the debtors of the land. It is true we have had a panic, but it has been among the money-changers and has not extended to merchants and traders

Mr. BOATNER. Let me suggest to the gentleman that as we do not have as severe winds here as you do in Texas, what we consider a considerable blow you would probably consider only gentle zephyr. Mr. KILGORE.

Mr. KILGORE. Well, we do things in Texas, it is true, on a larger scale. When we blow we blow, as my colleague, Mr. CULBERSON, suggests. [Laughter.]

Now, I would like to know, and I will come at once to the question asked by my friend from Louisiana in this connection—I would like to know when there came from any small dealer, I would like to know when there came from any small dealer, any retail merchant, any merchant in a small city or town in the agricultural sections of the country, a demand for the passage of this law? It is proposed in this bill to secure to the farmer, the man whose chief business is that of agriculture, the right voluntarily to become a bankrupt. In that respect I say the bill is vicious. It is not a system of uniform bankruptcy. Have they asked for that? Has there ever been a single demand made by a single farmer in this land for the passage of a law giving them a single farmer in this land for the passage of a law giving them the right to go into bankruptcy, coupled with the right of the creditor to force into bankruptcy his retail merchant?

Has there ever been, from any portion of this broad land, a demand from any retail dealer, large or small, in any portion of the country outside of the great commercial centers, asking the passage of this law? Nobody has ever presented it to this House. If it is true that there has been such a demand we are ignorant of it, and it would be well enough for the gentlemen who advocate this measure to make known to the House and the country such demand.

Who does demand it? This celebrated Torrey bankruptcy bill had its origin in a cabal of wholesale dealers in the city of St. had its origin in a cabal of wholesale dealers in the city of St. Louis, who, acting together with their lawyers, undertook to frame a bill which they presented to this House in the Fifty-first Congress; and under the methods peculiar to that Congress it went through this House with, however, nearly every Democratin the House against it. Some of those who are now favoring it were then opposed to it. It is the wholesale dealers, it is the it were then opposed to it. It is the wholesale dealers, it is the big merchants, it is the aggregated wealth of a few people that demands the passage of this bill; and in my judgment it is against the interests of the great mass of the people of the United States. They say that the wage-earner shall not be subject to its provisions. He has the right, however, to voluntarily surrender his estate and receive the benefit of this law.

Have any of them asked that? Has anybody asked the passage of this law except the class of people I have named? When it was first introduced into the Fifty-first Congress, it came with a great flourish of popular favor, with a loud and prolonged shout a great flourish of popular favor, with a loud and prolonged shout from the wholesale dealers, from the merchants' exchanges, from the commercial organizations all over the country, saying that the commercial organizations all over the country, saying that this was an eminently just and fair measure, and they demanded its enactment in the interest of the whole people. They always say that when they demand special favors and exclusive privileges for themselves. And when a few of us undertook to impede its passage through the House, the subservient and zealous tools of the aggregated wealth of the great commercial centers the daily press—were prompt to misrepresent, slander, and abuse the representatives of the people.

The weekly papers of the country, representing the sentiments of the people whose interests were to be most largely affected by this bill, and who were more deeply concerned in its provisions and administration than any other class of people, com-mended, so far as my experience goes, the action of those who were prominent in the fight, in the Fifty-second Congress, against

Now, what is the purpose of this legislation? What particular vil exists that this bill is to cure? What is the complaint? Is evil exists that this bill is to cure? evil exists that this bill is to cure? What is the complaint? Is there any greatevil which is to be eradicated by this measure? If the it has not been communicated to anybody here. The coun-80, it has not been communicated to anybody here. The country, so far as I know, and Congress, so far as I have heard, are orant of it.

Then if it is not to cure some defect in the present law, not to remove some great evil that can not be otherwise overcome, I say this House ought not to pass this bill. It is an extraordinary and dangerous experiment, containing the wildest and most nary and dangerous experiment, containing the wildest and most conspicuous incongruities that have ever been grouped together in any measure within my experience. I will talk about them before I get through with what I have to say. It is understood I am talking against time anyhow as I am to have the floor the remainder of the afternoon. [Laughter.]

The great papers of the land, which have demanded this law, say nothing as to the necessity for it or the evil which it is to cure, or the good which is to be effected. They know nothing about it. The commercial exchanges and mercantile organizations of the great cities say that it is for their interests, and that is all that the metropolitan papers want to know to enlist them in behalf of it, however it may injure the interests of the people and infringe their rights and liberties.

The only complaint that we hear of on this floor is that now

The only complaint that we hear of on this floor is that now and then in the history of commercial transactions some man will become involved and will execute an assignment in which he will prefer some one, or two, or more of his creditors. principal complaint is that he will now and then prefer some member of his family when he finds himself in a failing condition. And the complaint is that these are fraudulent prefer-

Mr. PATTERSON. Most of the States prohibit preferences.
Mr. KILGORE. They prohibit fraudulent preferences.
Mr. RAY. You think he ought to keep it all in the family!

[Laughter.]
Mr. KILGORE. It is a very common occurrence for men in business to borrow money from their kinsfolk, and if they have done so they could not be guilty of fraud if they gave them the preference in the settlement with their creditors. The Scriptures, you know, say that the man who does not provide for his own household "hath denied the faith, and is worse than an

Mr. BOATNER. The Scripture does not say anything about providing for them with other people's goods, does it?
Mr. KILGORE. It does not.

Mr. BOATNER. That is what you seem to want to do.
Mr. KILGORE. I do not want to do anything of the kind.

Mr. RAY. You concede that that practice opens the door to the greatest frauds, do you not?

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Speaker, I have had some little experience in suits growing out of mercantile transactions. I have had a good deal of experience in that direction, and I have known very few fraudulent conveyances made which, when properly and vigorously attacked, were not set aside by the courts. Every man has his remedy against fraudulent conveyances in the courts of the country. I have known a very small number of fraudulent conveyances in my experience as a lawyer, and while it has not been a very large experience, yet I have had considerable in dealing with failing debtors, and I have generally represented the foreign creditor with a fair measure of success.

Mr. RAY. Let me call your attention to the fact that it has been frequently held that the statute of limitations is a personal privilege. That is the place of it is court in prevently in the statute of the s privilege. That is, the plea of it in court is a personal privilege.

Mr. KILGORE. That is the invariable rule, I think.

Mr. RAY. So that it has been customary in many instances for persons finding themselves in failing circumstances to prefer So that it has been customary in many instances their wives for old debts, twenty-five, thirty, and thirty-five years of age, where it was impossible for the creditors to prove that they were fraudulent, and so put away the entire property to the detriment of the creditors who had given their credit very recently, so that they consumed and took the whole property and held it against the creditors who had even within a few weeks given credit.

Mr. KILGORE. I have never known such a case as is men-Mr. Killecke. I have never known such a case as is mentioned by the gentleman from New York. He states extreme cases, such as seldom arise, if ever. General rules can not be predicated on rare and exceptional cases. I am aware that the statute of limitations is a personal privilege; but when a man undertakes to prefer some of his relations by paying old debts which seem to have long since been barred by limitation, such a transaction would not stand in a court of justice.

Now, I say, what evil do you propose to impeach by this legislation? You propose to prevent preferential payments, to use the language of an English magazine. They have had all the experience of three hundred and fifty years in England under a experience of three nundred and fitty years in England under a bankrupt law, and they have passed and repealed and reënacted bankrupt laws at different periods, beginning with the firstone, in the time of Henry VIII, down to 1833, numbering in all about thirty different bankruptcy acts. They have now the law of 1883, which they say is the perfection of human reason in that respect; and yet only very recently the inspector-general of bankruptcy, Mr. Smith, in 1891, making his report upon the working of the law, found in the Bankers' Magazine of recent date, says:

With recent to fraudulent preferences, for at least preferences by which

With regard to fraudulent preferences, (or at least preferences by which creditors are defrauded) it is, Mr. Smith believes—
"A popular idea that the bankruptcy law effectively provides against preferential payments on the eve of bankruptcy. It was probably intended to do so, but in many respects this intention has entirely failed under the present law as well as under its predecessors."

For three hundred and fifty years the British people have been passing bankruptcy laws and administering them in their courts, and in 1891, under the law which they say can not be improved, they have been unable to prevent preference of creditors and preferential payments, which, says the inspectorgeneral, results in the defrauding of other creditors; and he gives the circumstances under which these payments are made in the following languages: ing language:

In have in previous reports pointed out how, notwithstanding the apparent intentions of the legislature, transactions of this character are still frequent and too often unassailable. Thus, for example, a payment made by an insolvent debtor to his banker with a deliberate view of relieving a guarantor from his liability can not be impeached, atthough frit were given with the view of preferring the banker himself, it would be void; and bankers are frequently being preferred in this manner with impunity. It is clear that the general body of creditore are equally defrauded, whether it was the private intention in the mind of the debtor to prefer the guarantor, or to prefer the banker, and in both cases one creditor is really preferred at the expense of the rest.

And he says that this practice can not be assailed. It is a perfectly apparent transaction, which the law can not contravene; and yet the only thing that this law proposes to do, the only purpose of it, is to remove from the debtor the power to only purpose of it, is to remove from the dector the power to prefer some one or more of his creditors. Now, I say, with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Lane], that there is no great wrong, or in a vast majority of such preferences I have never known of a great deal of wrong or fraud to arise out of these preferences in my own experience; and I venture to say that it is the experience of nine-tenths of the lawyers of the country that many preferences which have been given can not be assailed.

It is deathing of the common law and as the gentleman from erences which have been given can not be assailed.

It is a doctrine of the common law, and as the gentleman from Illinois said, it has existed for five hundred years. Now, the ostensible purpose of this bill, as declared by its advocates, is to prevent a failing debtor from favoring one or more of his creditors, though he may be acting in perfect good faith indoing so. I take this occasion to emphasize the declaration that he who bone fide prefers a creditor to whom he owes a just debt is guilty of no fraud; and all the laws and all the adjudication of the courts which have decounced such conduct as fraudulent have not conwhich have denounced such conduct as fraudulent have not convinced enlightened mankind of the fact. And in this illustra-tion we find the reason why the legislation against preference and preferential payments on the eve of bankruptcy has been a conspicuous failure. It involves no tarpressed, can impart to it any criminality whatever.

It may be forbidden by law, with severe penalties common to criminal laws, as provided in the pending bill, but all this will be criminal laws, as provided in the pending bill, but all this will be criminal laws, as provided in the pending bill, but all this will be criminal laws, as provided in the pending bill, but all this will be criminal laws, as provided in the pending bill, but all this will be criminal laws, as provided in the pending bill, but all this will be criminal laws, as provided in the pending bill, but all this will be criminal laws, as provided in the pending bill, but all this will be criminal laws, as provided in the pending bill, but all this will be criminal laws, as provided in the pending bill, but all this will be criminal laws, as provided in the pending bill, but all this will be criminal laws, as provided in the pending bill, but all this will be criminal laws, as provided in the pending bill, but all this will be criminal laws. not convince mankind that it is a crime. Hence all such laws must necessarily be futile, ineffective. Such preferences may hinder and delay some other just claim; such is the effect, and they may defeat the payment of some just claim; but it is the sense of civilized markind that the debtor executing such prefences is guilty of no fraud in fact. The pending bill itself declares preferences in favor of the State or United States Government, in favor of certain lien-holders, and in favor of debts of a fiduciary nature.

It is not the purpose of this measure to prevent preferences, fraudulent nor any other kind. Its projectors and advocates know that can not be done. Its only object is to lodge with the wholesale people the power to coerce and to crush at their will the retail dealer.

Now, I want to discuss some few of the propositions in this Now, I want to discuss some few of the propositions in this bill, and then a few of its features in detail. The bill provides for voluntary and involuntary bankruptcy. I would be willing to assent to the passage of a measure providing for voluntary bankruptcy if it were so guarded that it could not be used to perpetrate fraud and disturb business relations. It is said that there are thousands of people formerly in business who have been carried down without any fault on their part; that they are down by misfortune, and some legislation for their relief ought to be enacted. A voluntary system of bankruptcy would reach to be enacted. A voluntary system of bankruptcy would reach that class of people. The statistics show, and I believe it appears in the report of the majority of the committee, that less than 2 per cent of the merchants fail annually—one in every sixty-seven is said to be about the ratio. And not one in every hundred of those who fail about the ratio. And not one inevery numeric of those who fail are guilty of any fraud.

Now, it is the failing debtor that this bill is to reach; and if we are to accept the statement of its defenders here, its purpose is to prevent debtors from defrauding their creditors. Now, if there is only one failure out of sixty-seven merchants in each year, where is the reason or the justice or common sense of enacting a complicated law of this kind merely to handle the estate of one merchant or trader in every sixty-seven engaged in bustacting a complicated law of this kind merely to handle the estate of one merchant or trader in every sixty-seven engaged in business, and to prevent one man in every sixty-seven in each year from preferring some of his creditors? This is an experiment which has been tried for three hundred and fifty years without success; yet it is contended that the pending bill can be so administered as to enable the creditors to dictate an equitable distribution of the debtor's estate, and save both debtor and creditor, and still this is the most drastic, the most far-reaching, the most incongruous bankrupt bill ever presented to an intelligent people.

The English people have much stronger reasons for having a bankruptcy laws than can be urged in their behalf in this country. They have but one source of legislation, the British Parliament. They have but one system of laws while we have forty-four; and since the bankrupt law of 1867 went out of existence the remedies of which the creditor can avail himself against a failing debtor have been enlarged and simplified. Why does he nee debtor have been enlarged and simplified. Why does he need an involuntary bankruptcy system? He can go into court and protect himself by invoking the remedies provided both in law and equity. He can proceed by attachment, by garnishment, by sequestration; these are summary and indeed harsh remedies, by sequestration; these are summary and indeed narra remedies; but they are always at hand. He can close out his debtor, he can force him to a settlement, and if he is diligent he can secure his share of the estate; for if a dozen attachments are levied upon a man's property simultaneously, that involves an equal distribution of the estate. Or if they are levied one after another and there is enough to pay them all, each gets his share. But what if there is not enough? That seems to be the trouble, that even are diverged in time with his attach.

But what if there is not enough? That seems to be the trouble, that some creditor is not on the ground in time with his attachment to secure his share of the estate, and someone else who is more diligent gets in ahead, and therefore this law is desired in order to make, as gentlemen say, a more equitable distribution. Under every system of bankruptcy that has existed in this country the result has been the same; the creditor gets little or nothing.

It is the history of nearly every estate that was administered in the bankrupt court in the district in which I live that the creditor got nothing or very little. If a creditor got 5 per cent of his debt he was a fortunate man. Nine times out of ten the estate did not yield more than enough to pay the lawyers and the costs of court; sometimes not so much. Yet it is proposed here now to precipitate that same condition of things upon the country, and all this merely to prevent the chance that some one country, and all this merely to prevent the chance that some one man in five hundred who fail may fraudulently prefer some mem-ber of his family or other creditor, or to prevent the resident creditor tor getting his attachment in ahead of the nonresident creditor.

That is about all that it is claimed can be accomplished by this proposed law. I say it is unnecessary to have any involuntary system of bankruptcy in this country, but if this House is to agree upon a voluntary system, it can not be framed upon this bill. The whole matter will have to be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and they will have to frame a bill based upon the idea of a system of voluntary bankruptcy.

They have mingled the administrative features of this measure in relation to the voluntary and the involuntary feature of the bill so that they could not be separated or amended in the

I do not believe myself that it is necessary to pass any bank-rupt law at all, but I would be willing to provide for a voluntary system. Four men out of five in my experience who have made an honest failure and surrendered their assets to their creditors by assignment or any other method are generally able to get a compromise with their creditors and settle at 25, 30, or 40 cents on the dollar and set up in business again and go right along.

Mr. BOATNER. Did the gentleman ever know of a settlement of that sort in which some of the creditors did not blackmail the debtor and get more than any one else for their acqui-

Mr. KILGORE. Such may be the case in many settlements, but they have not come within my experience. But if that were true each of the creditors gets more than would be distributed in bankruptcy.

Mr. BOATNER. Is it not within the gentleman's experience that those settlements are generally attended with very great difficulty, because where the failure is one of any importance there are always some creditors who insist that they are entitled to receive more than others, and who, in most instances, have to be paid more than others in order to effectuate the settle-

Mr. KILGORE. I know that does happen in some cases. But such settlements are attended with no more difficulty than a settlement in a bankrupt court and not half so much expense. In all such settlements there are some creditors who may be entitled to more than others.

Mr. BOATNER. Will the gentleman not concede that such a settlement should be made under legal process which would do equal justice to all parties according to their interests?

Mr. KILGORE. Yes, if it could be done in that way. But it can not be done. It never has been done and it never will be done. You can not pass any law that will prevent men from preferring some of their creditors, even if they have to do it by fraud and perjury. You can not frame any law that will compel an equitable and fair distribution of the assets of the failing debtor. I have never known a settlement to be made in my part of the country in which the creditors did not get at least 40 or 50 cents on the dollar; and I have known some big failures-big failures for interior merchants.

In such cases an assignment would be made to keep attaching creditors away. Creditors would come in and an agreement would be entered into; the debtor would secure 40 or 50 cents on the dollar to his creditors and his business goes on as before. In this way the merchant's credit would be saved. In these cases, if the estate were administered in bankruptcy the creditors if the estate were administered in bankruptcy the creditors would not get 10 cents on the dollar; in addition to that, the credit and character of the debtor would be ruined, his business would be broken up, and the business of his neighbors would be demoralized by putting a bankrupt stock on the market to compete with goods sold in the legitimate trade.

Mr. RAY. Have you not in your State any law that regulates or limits preferences?

Mr. KILGORE. No, sir; we have made several efforts by our legislation to properly preferences.

Mr. KILGORE. No, sir; we have made several efforts by our legislation to prevent preferences.

Mr. RAY. Are they not restricted in any way?

Mr. KILGORE. They are not now. The courts held that our assignment law, the purpose of which was to prevent preferences, was not sufficient—did not accomplish the purpose. Another method of making assignments and preferring creditors has been pursued by debtors in our State; and it is regarded as entirely decisioned and the purpose. tirely legitimate, and has been upheld by the appellate courts

Mr. RAY. Then you have had and now have a law regulating the giving of preferences?

Mr. KILGORE. In a certain sense it may regulate them. It

Mr. KILGORE. In a certain sense it may regulate them?

Mr. RAY. Does it not restrict them?

Mr. KILGORE. There was an attempt by law to restrict them; but like all other laws in that direction, the effort failed.

Mr. RAY. But you have such a law on your statute book?

Mr. KILGORE. We had a law which attempted, as has been law on them States, to prevent preferences.

done in other States, to prevent preferences.

Mr. RAY. Does not the prevalence of these laws in all the States show that the general tendency of lawmaking bodies is to restrict preferences Mr. KILGORE. A

Mr. KILGORE. And the general tendency of the decisions of the courts is that such laws can not be effectual. Laws of that kind have not been able to prevent preferences.

Mr. RAY. Supposing that to be true, does not the fact of the passage of such laws show the prevalence of the general opinion that the giving of preferences should be regulated and restrained?

Mr. KILGORE. That is the prevailing opinion among creditors who are not on the ground—among the great wholesale dealers at a distance who undertake to dictate legislation and who have more facilities for doing so than the small creditor who is usually preferred.

Mr. RAY. May I ask you this plain question: Do you believe that the debtor should be left without any restriction whatever that the debter should be left without any restriction whatever to prefer whomever he may please?

Mr. KILGORE. No, sir; I do not go that far; but I do believe that the debter ought to have the right to prefer a creditor who is entitled to preference; and in many cases certain creditors are entitled to preference over others.

Take the case of the small dealer who has been doing business for a series of years with a certain wholesale merchant, buying goods from him and paying for them every four or six months. During all this time the merchant has made money out of the retail dealer. Now when that small dealer gets into financial trouble and he finds himself in trouble by a condition of things for which he is not responsible—a condition brought on by the financial circumstances of the country or the legislation of the country or the taxation of the country—when he finds himself in danger of going to the wall, his neighbor loans him $500 or a thousand dollars in money. In such a case I believe it is the duty of that dealer to prefer a creditor who advanced him the money and who has received no benefit from the loan. The only thing that legislation has ever accomplished has been to hedge sround the debtor in such a way as to minimize fraudulent pref-

As a rule is it not a fact that when a debtor comes Mr. RAY. Mr. RAY. As a rule is it not a fact that when a declar comes to give preferences, instead of preferring the man who has recently loaned him money, or who has recently given him credit, he prefers the man with whom he has been dealing for years, who has given him credit for years, because his object is to go into business again, and he expects to get credit from that same source? Mr. KILGORE. I know that is the reasoning usually adopted on this subject; but that is not generally the fact according to my experience. Men of honor and integrity who fall into misfortune in their business always favor their neighbors who have added them in their trouble. There is a strong sentiment in our sided them in their trouble. country on that subject.

Now, the gentleman from Lousiana [Mr. BOATNER] asked me whether the farmers as a class will be ruined by the enactment

I am not posing, Mr. Chairman, as a special champion of the farmers any more than I am of any other class of worthy people. They are no better and no worse than any other honest, deserving, and industrious people. My neighbors are farmers, most of them, my constituents are farmers, and I would have been a farmer myself if I had not had an invincible repugnance to manual [Laughter.] I was raised on a farm, and have experienced much of hardship of such a life in early times in Texas.

I know something of the hardships of a farmer's life. something of his privations and of his deprivations. I know that he does not receive a fair and just compensation for his labor. His is, transcendently, the most important vocation known to civilization. Without the product of his labor the human race would perish from the face of the earth. He pays the taxes of the Government; he fights her battles in war, and wins her victories. He asks only that equal and exact justice and equal and uniform budens shall be apportioned to all alike. The retail merchant is an essential part of the system in all agricultural coun-The farmer can no more get along without the retail dealer who is his neighbor, than the retail dealer can get along without the farmer. They are essential to each other, and when you strike down the retail dealer, as you propose to do by this bill, when you put it in the power of one of his creditors to destroy him—and there is not a retail merchant in Texas who, under the provisions of this bill, could not be put into bankruptcy any day—when you destroy him, you greatly injure the agricultural interest to which he is a valuable, perhaps indispensable adjunct.

Mr. OATES. How can he be hurt by the bill if he pays his debta? Mr. KILGORE. If he is able to pay his debts and pays them promptly as they mature, that may be true. But there is not a day in the year in which the retail merchant in the interior would not be menaced by his creditors under this measure, and in which he could not be crushed by the wholesale merchant if this bill should become a law.

Mr. OATES. Are they insolvent, too?

Mr. KILGORE. Well, the question of insolvency as defined by this bill is as uncertain as the nature of the man who inhabits the moon.

Mr. OATES. Would not the gentleman be satisfied with the verdict of the jury as to the solvency of the man?

Mr. KILGORE. But there is no rule by which you can determine whether his property, at a fair valuation, is sufficient to pay his debts.

Well, the jury in such a case would not be Mr. OATES. likely to decide that he is insolvent without proper inquiry.

Mr. KILGORE. Well, whatisa "fair valuation"? You know where a question is left so indefinite as this bill leaves it that you can not expect any certainty in the results.

Mr. OATES. But the burden of proof would be on the plaintiff.

If they can satisfy the jury that the party is insolvent, the jury would render their verdict in accordance.

Mr. KILGORE. That may be so; and that is a very simple statement of a very grave and complicated matter. The debtor can be dragged into the Federal court at the suggestion of one of his creditors. If he has a dozen creditors or a hundred, under the provisions of this bill any one of them controlling $500 of his indebtedness can carry him and his property and business into the United States court and try the question of his solvency, and this same creditor can put him into that court and have an inquiry as to whether or not he has been guilty of any wrong or fraud in the conduct of his business or suffered any misfortune which his vigilant and exacting creditors could use against him. If he has less than twelve creditors, any one of them owning as much as $500 worth of claims against him can put him into the bankrupt court and have him tried for an act of bankruptcy. If he has more than twelve creditors, any one of them can prefer the charge against him that he is guilty of some act of bankruptcy and carry him into court, but can not compel an adjudication unless other creditors join in the petition. If he is acquitted of the charge, and it is found his property is sufficient to pay his debts, and he is discharged, he is nevertheless ruined; he is a ruined man, and you know it.

You know how sensitive and delicate the credit of a merchant When he has been taken by one creditor or three creditors into the Federal court or into any other court to determine the question of his solvency, and whether he has perpetrated a fraud on his creditors or not or done anything declared to be an act of bankruptcy by this bill and he is subjected to the provisions of the bill and discharged with the verdict that he is not guilty, still his ruin has been accomplished. And any man, an enemy, who could acquire possession of $500 of his indebtedness can at any time put the debtor in the Federal court and that means, as I have shown, his utter ruin. It is scarcely then a question of solvency, because ruin follows anyhow, the ruin of the debtor, and he is absolutely without any remedy for the malicious wrong which he may suffer at the hands of his enemy

Mr. CULBERSON. And, if my colleague will permit me, there is no method prescribed in this bill by which you shall ascertain the fair market value of the property; whether it is to be a cash sale, or whether it is to be a sale on credit, or whether it is to be sold at the tax valuation, or what not.

Mr. KILGORE. I thank my colleague for the suggestion; and the fact that no reasonable rule can be prescribed under the definition given in the bill will constitute the greatest difficulty in such trials. There is no provision and there can be none by in such trials. There is no provision and there can be none by which to determine the matter, for if a man sets up that the property real and personal is worth $10,000, and they go to the tax roll and see that at a certain time it was rendered for taxation $7,000, a difficulty arises at once as to a "fair valuation." Mr. CULBERSON. That is it exactly.

Mr. KILGORE. And how are you to determine the question of value? It varies necessarily every day with the varying conditions of trade and finance.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the centianum from Toyan.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask unanimous consent that my colleague may have time to conclude his argument.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas Mr. CULBER-SON] asks unanimous consent that his colleague may have time to conclude his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOATNER Will the gentleman yield to me for a question right there?
Mr. KILGORE. Certainly I will.

Mr. BOATNER. Has the gentleman ever known a merchant to suspend his payments for thirty days while insolvent, and remain under protest, and still live in business?
Mr. KILGORE. "While insolvent"?

Mr. BOATNER. Yes.
Mr. KILGORE. How are you first going to find out whether he is insolvent or not?

Mr. BOATNER. Have you ever known a merchant to be under protest for thirty days without a liquidation of his busi-

Why, it is not an uncommon occurrence for Mr. KILGORE. a man to have drafts come through the bank and even be protested, and have the bank to carry him a few days.

Mr. BAILEY. Commercial paper need not even be protested. If it simply remains thirty days unpaid after maturity, that is a sufficient ground under this bill for putting him into bank-

Mr. KILGORE. It does not require that it shall go to protest. Formal protest is not needed to charge him with an act of

Mr. BOATNER. I agree with the gentleman in the idea that this ground of involuntary bankruptcy should be stricken out of the bill. At the same time, so far as my experience goes, whenever a merchant goes to protest and is unable to provide for his paper his business is at an end until it is reorganized.

Mr. KILGORE. It is not the rule to draw checks on the re-tail merchant in the country towns in the interior subject to protest.

The difficulty with the country merchant is that he sells his goods on credit, and must do it. Now, the country merchant is the customer of the wholesale dealer, who wants to have him completely under his control. He wants to be able to blackmail him or effect his destruction whenever it suits his purpose. He wants to be able to drag him into court, and he can do it under the taking of a man into a Federal court is a very serious matter. We have an area of 275,000 square miles in Texas, which you all know is nearly "as big as all out of doors," and we have eleven points at which the Federal courts are held, and there are thousands of people in Texas who live 250 or 300 miles from the nearest point where the Federal court is held.

That condition is not peculiar to Texas. It is true of all the great States of the West having a large territory. Now you can understand just how dangerous and oppressive may be this measure, with the facilities which it will afford to any creditor to take an unfortunate debtor into court. It may be done, not on account of any fraud or wrong, but on account of some misfortune; or there may have been no misfortune at all. A man may be perfectly solvent, but on certain allegations which the creditor may make in his petition, he can take the debtor into court and inquire into the question of his solvency, and if he is found under this law to be solvent and is discharged, his usefulness and success as a merchant is at an end, and he has no remedy against his creditor who has wrought his ruin. There is no escape from these features of the bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to talk a little about the details of this bill. There are some rather funny things in it. It has in it a dictionary full of definitions no man ever heard of before, and Congress is, mind you, called on to enact this dictionary and make it a part of the law of the land.

Among other things it says:

Words importing the masculine gender may be applied to and include corporations, partnerships, and women.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as little as you may think of it, by this legislation our women may be converted into corporations. The bill absolutely abolishes all distinctions between men and women, and all distinctions between women and corporations; and when a man has gone out and courted some good-looking girl, spent days, and weeks, and months, and all his spare shekels wheedling her into matrimony, and after he has at last succeeded, it turns out he has married a blasted and soulless corporation. What are we coming to? [Laughter.]

That is not all. Not half. The bill goes on to say that—

(28). Words importing the plural number may be applied to and mean only a single person or thing; (29) words importing the singular number may be applied to and mean several persons or things.

Now, after a man has succeeded in fooling some good woman into matrimony, and then finds he has made no blunder, he would be liable to a prosecution for having a plurality of wives if this bill goes on the statute books in its present shape, for it says "words importing the singular number may be applied to mean several persons."

This bill, in providing a dictionary, proposes other innova-tions at the same time. Here is what it says:

Words which are given a meaning or made to include other words herein, then used in one tense, shall have a corresponding meaning when used in

The pending measure not only enacts a dictionary, but it actually repeals the grammar. I am rather glad that such is the case, for I have ever cherished a malicious repugnance to all grammars. [Laughter.] They have been a stumbling-block in my way all my life. Let them be abolished. [Laughter.]

Now, when, as Mr. Dickens says, "a man has conjugated himself into the imperative mood," he will at the same time find that he is also in the indicative mood.

that he is also in the indicative mood. Moods and tenses and c'ses no longer preserve their distinguishing characteristics. They are homologued, so to speak—made one and the same by this bill. It is an offense punishable by imprisonment two years for a bankrupt to conceal any property belonging to his estats so the declaration that he would conceal some of his property would, according to the grammar of this bill, be an admission that he had done so, and he would stand a fair chance to go to the penitentiary on his admissions, whether he was guilty or not. And when a candidate for some office has been skirmishing for months and finally achieves the nominative case, he is dumfounded when he learns that by an act of Congress he is placed in the vocative.

While the authors of this bill were at work on the scheme to abolish the grammar, they might at the same time have done something for a weary world by repealing the spelling book. [Laughter.] In doing so they would in some degree have atoned for the mischief they do in other respects, and earned the grattude of the bulk of mankind.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if this measure should become the law it will open wide the door to all sorts of opportunities for the perpetration of freud by adventurers in the mercantile profession. Many such can command the money to begin business with fair stocks of goods purchased largely on credit, and with a fair standing they can enlarge their business till suddenly it col-lapses, and an investigation discloses a wide disparity between the liabilities and the assets, and the further fact that the debter has in the meantime acquired and paid for a valuable hom has in the meantime acquired and paid for a valuable nume stead and other exempt property protected by State laws and the measure under consideration. The debtor may acquire exstead and other exempt property projected by State laws and the measure under consideration. The debtor may acquire exempt property to any amount and up to the very day before the filing of a petition in bankruptcy, and he can defy his creditors and hold the property to the extent of the exemptions.

This would be deliberately fraudulent, yet the law affords ample protection to transactions such as I have described. I have known just such cases in my own experience. The strong est influence which now operates to deter men from engaging in such fraudulent transactions is found in the fact that his debts remain against him, and his creditors harass almost the lifeout of him for years to come. Pass this bill and you contribute greatly to the promotion of all such schemes and devices for defrauding creditors.

The homestead, which the laws of Texas exempt to every head of a family, may be worth $50,000 or more.

Mr. CULBERSON. Without limit, practically.

Mr. KILGORE. Yes, as my colleague suggests, without limit.

The law provides that a man is entitled to a lot or lots in a city or lower which shall not be worth at the time they are selected. or town which shall not be worth at the time they are selected for a homestead more than $5,000; but he can put a dwelling and a business house on them worth $100,000 or worth any amount, A homestead in the country consists of 200 acres of land with all A nonestead in the country consists of 200 acres of land with all the mills, gins, factories, and everything pertaining to such a property. All that is exempt from forced sale in Texas, and when people deal with our people they deal with them with full knowledge of these large exemptions, which are perhaps the largest that are made by any State in the Union. The passage of this bill, instead of imposing restraint on fraudulent transactions, will tend to encourage all sorts of profligacy and fraud and peculation.

The bill provides that "if a person within six months prior to

The bill provides that "if a person within six months prior to The bill provides that "II a person within six months prior to the filing of a petition against him concealed himself with the intent to avoid the service of civil process and to defeat his creditors" he is guilty of an act of bankruptcy. It then defines the word "conceal" and says that it shall include "secrete," "falsify," "mutilate," "remove," "suppress." Let us see how this reads when analyzed. If any person shall secrete himself, falsify himself, mutilate himself, remove himself, or suppress himself, the same process himself, and the same person shall secrete himself. self, he shall be deemed guilty of an act of bankruptcy! be assumed that the intention of the act is to make an act of bankruptcy for a debtor to conceal himself during the entiresix months prior to filing a petition against him. But the language of the bill would indicate that he would be guilty of an act of bankruptcy if he concealed himself at any time within six montas prior to the filing of a petition against him. No man can tell what this most remarkable measure does mean.

Another act of bankruptcy is where a person "makes a transfer of his property with intent to defeat his creditors." fer of his property with intent to defeat his creditors." Now, I would like to ask how it is possible to establish the intent except by the proof of the transfer, and if the intent is proven by the transfer you tie the hands of business men effectually. "Transfer" is defined to mean "sale" and every other method of parting with property or its possession. How is a min to know when to sell or buy under this law, if it should pass.

Mr. BOATNER. Let me ask the gentleman is not fraudulent transfer a ground for an attachment in his State?

Mr. KILGORE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BOATNER. In sustaining an attachment is it sufficient to prove that the property has been transferred without proving

Mr. BOATNER. In sustaining an attachment is it sufficient to prove that the property has been transferred without proving the intent? Mr. KILGORE. You can not traverse the affidavit for an attachment in Texas.

Mr. BOATNER. Mr. KILGORE. You can not?

Then I understand the gentleman to say Mr. BOATNER. that if a creditor takes out an attachment upon the ground of fraudulent transfer of property and swears to the fraudulent intent, that is conclusive?

Mr. KILGORE. You can not traverse the affidavit but in a trial on a plea in reconvention for damages for the wrongful or malicious suing out of an attachment you can controvert the allegations in the affidavit. This can be done in the original

I understand now then, that the affidavit Mr. BOATNER. can be controverted?

Mr. KILGORE. He may set up that plea, but he must plead his case with the same certainty that is required of a plaintiff.

Mr. BOATNER. Then in that suit for damages the verity of the affidavit in support of the attachment is at issue?

Mr. KILGORE. Yes, sir; if the pleadings of the defendant are so framed as to put them in issue.

Mr. BOATNER. Now, in that issue, where the defendant swears that he did not do what the affidavit charges him with doing, that is, that he did not make the transfer with fraudulent intent, is not the onus of proof upon the plaintiff to show the intent with which the act was done, and must not the intent be ascertained by all the surrounding facts, and the evidence in the

Mr. KILGORE. I think that is about the practice in Texas, except the burden is on the defendant to make out by competent evidence the case he has alleged.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. With the permission of the gentleman from Texas, I will ask the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER] a question. Do not you consider that there is a very great difference between an attachment proceeding where the plaintiff has to give a bond for damages and this method of 'yanking" the debtor up in this bankruptcy proceeding, and making the very same allegations against him without giving any bond?

Mr. KILGORE. "I thank thee, Roderick, for the word!"

Mr. KILGORE. "I thank thee, Roderick, for the word!"
[Laughter.]
Mr. BOATNER. There is a difference between the two proceedings, the difference being in favor of the bankruptcy proceeding. In the attachment case the creditor may obtain his writ at any time by making affidavit and giving bond; and that proceeding is ex parte. The sheriff immediately executes the writ by taking possession of the property. On the other hand, in the proceeding proposed by this bill the creditor can only file an ordinary suit in conjunction with certain other creditors; pending the proceeding the defendant is not deprived of the spread of this property; he is not interfered with in its use or possession of his property; he is not interfered with in its use or occupancy; and the issue as to whether he has done the acts charged against him is one which must be tried by a jury. No hurt can come to the party. If proceedings are instituted maliciously, without proper cause, the person instituting such proceedings is liable under the elementary rules of law to damages for having done so.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Do you not think that this proceedand the proceeding in bankruptcy which allows a man to come into court and make affidavit, without any bond back of him, that a debtor has conveyed away his property fraudulently or is going to do so, is liable ultimately to do him just as much damage in a commercial sense, and so far as his financial standing is concerned, as cial sense, and so far as his financial standing is concerned, as an attachment proceeding against him?

Mr. BOATNER. I do not—not by any means.

Mr. KILGORE. I am very glad that this interruption has taken place, especially as it does not come out of my time. Now, as I have said heretofore, the bill declares it an act of bankruptcy if the debtor "made a transfer of any of his property with intent to defeat his creditors." I say the intention must be proven by

I suppose the man would have the right to controvert the charge upon the trial; yet a man in perfect innocence and in a perfectly proper and legitimate transaction may have sold propperfectly proper and legitimate transaction may have sold property in the ordinary course of business, may have conveyed property to some creditor in perfect good faith, yet this transaction furnishes the foundation for some oversuspicious creditor to assail his standing and character as a business man in the United States court, which may be held 100 miles from his domicile; and then, after a trial by the court or jury, at a heavy expense, including lawyers' and witness' fees and traveling expenses, he may be acquitted; but who can repair the damage he

Mr. RAY. And there is no provision by which he can have the costs awarded him against parties making such a charge.

Mr. KILGORE. So I understand. There is nothing in this bill charging persons who institute such a proceeding with the costs if the proceeding fails.

Another act of bankruptcy is when the debtor has "made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors." I suppose it means an assignment under the State law. When a man makes an assignment for the benefit of all his creditors, why should that be regarded as an act of bankruptcy if all the creditors live in the State in which he himself resides? Why not leave this matter to be handled by the State courts under the State law which provides for assignments and for the distribution of property under such assignments?

When a man has made an honest assignment for the benefit of his creditors, all living, we assume, in his neighborhood, none living outside his State, none of them affected by any interstate question of commerce or trade—why not leave the matter to the State courts where the assignment can be assilled if fraudulent? Why should Federal authority undertake to assume control of a matter of that kind? By an express provision of the Constitu-tion the judicial power of the Federal Government extends to controversies between citizens of different States; and while Congress has authority under the Constitution to enact a uniform bankrupt law for the entire Republic, still it seems to me it would be bad policy in the exercise of this authority to pass a law which would annul the assignment laws of all the States which affect parties, debtor and creditors, residing in the same State. Another ground of bankruptcy is where a creditor has-

Made, while insolvent, a contract personally or by agents for the purchase or sale of a commodity with intent not to receive or deliver the same, but merely to receive or pay a difference between the contract and the market price thereof at a time subsequent to the making of such contract.

Now, the Supreme Court of the United States, in a very re-cent opinion, have declared that just such contracts are valid and binding on the parties, I do not care what the intention of the contracting parties may have been when they entered into the contract. If one contracted to buy and the other to sell, and the contract is in terms, that can be enforced, though it may have been their intention that no property should pass between have been their intention that no property should pass between them, and they may publish their purpose on the house tops, the contract is valid and can be enforced; and yet this bill says if a country merchant or small dealer enters into a valid contract and buys property with the intention of not delivering the property, or with the purpose of paying or receiving the difference between the price when the contract was made and at the date fixed for the delivery of the property, he shall be subject to be put in bankruptcy.

This is one of the many unique features of this bill. It is a part of the same general scheme that runs all through it to build part of the same general scheme that runs all through it to build up through the United States courts a broad system of paternalism which is avowedly hostile to that freedom and independence which should belong to every self-respecting citizen in the management of his own affairs. It provides for a guardianship over why, the merchants in my part of the country buy cotton from their customers. They contract with the spinner and buyer to deliver to him 1,000 bales of cotton, for instance, at some deliver to him 1,000 bales of cotton, for instance, at some date in the future. He may not own a single bale of cotton at the time he makes the contract. He may not have intended from the first to make the delivery, or if he intended to do so he may have changed his mind and determined not to deliver the may have changed his mind and determined not to deliver the property, or he may not have been able to control the property to enable him to comply with his contract. But on his failure to perform he is liable to the other party for such damages as he may have sustained by the default. They say this is gambling and that it ought to be abolished. But nearly all speculative trading, all speculation, is more or less gambling in that sense of the word. If it is gambling Congress can not deal with it.

Mr. STOCKDALE. At all events it ought not to be abolished in a bankrupt law.

Mr. KILGORE. No; as the gentleman from Mississippi says, it ought not to be abolished in a bankrupt law.

If they had gone on and provided that a man should be adjudged a bankrupt, if he being insolvent owned horses and carriages, there would have been just as much reason in it; or if they had made it an act of bankruptcy for an insolvent to buy more they had made it an act of bankruptcy for an insolvent to buy more than one silk dress for his wife in a year, or made it an act of bunkruptcy for a man who is insolvent to kiss his wife more than once or twice a month [laughter], or get drunk, or bet on a horse race, then there would have been a beautiful harmony in the measure. But here is a bill properly named a bankrupt bill, for it will bankrupt the agricultural masses if it is ever passed, framed by the great wholesale dealers of this country, with their lawyers shrewd and adroitand able at their elbows; and yet they put that sort of foolishness in a measure and ask Congress to mass it.

Again, Mr. Chairman, when we pass a measure of this kind Again, Mr. Chairman, when we pass a measure of this kind we bring dire confusion on the business and business relations of every person who engages in traffic of any kind. It will unsettle all internal business and trade and fill the land with wrong and fraud. It will come to pass that no man will trust his neighbor. If he buys property and invests in it all the savings of years of toil, there is no certainty that he can hold it. His vender may bankrupt within the next six months and his property must go into the hands of a truste rto be litigated in the United States court. The nurchaser may have hought in perfect good faith court. The purchaser may have bought in perfect good faith while his vender may have sold with the intent to defeat his The vender may be insolvent in fact, but the world creditors. The vender may be insolvent in fact, but the world can not know it in many cases until the question has been adjudicated in a bankruptcy proceeding; still, if he is guilty of any act of bankruptcy named in the pending bill all his trades and transactions with his neighbors and the country at large which have taken place within six months next preceding the filing of a petition in bankruptcy are out of joint and liable to be annulled. Your dishonest neighbor, if you happen to have one, may involve you in a trade, a horse trade or a cotton trade; you may buy 500 head of cattle or 500 acres of land from him, and within aix months he voluntarily seeks the protection of the bankrupt.

six months he voluntarily seeks the protection of the bankrupt court. Then your property is in litigation, with a clouded title. Or your vender may be perfectly honest and upright, with a wellestablished character for fair dealing, yet any one of his credit-ors, as we have seen, may force him into bankruptcy within six months of your transactions with him, and you must go into an expensive and inconvenient court to defend the title to your property, honestly acquired, but now clouded and endangered by the acts of strangers.

When you consider that nearly every man in every community mingles more or less in the innumerable transactions which attend the trade and traffic of the people you may have some slight conception of the confusion, confounded a thousand times over, which would exist under the proposed bankrupt act. The Republican measure which passed the Fifty-first Congress contained a provision authorizing the litigating of the title to property in the State courts in a contest between the vendee of the bankrupt and the trustee in bankruptcy. In that regard it was preferable to the bill under consideration. If this bill ever becomes the law of the land it will destroy confidence between man and man, it will unsettle traffic and paralyze business in all interior communities and fill the courts with endless and unseemly litigation.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If it will not interrupt the gentleman I would like to ask him one question just there.

Mr. KILGORE. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What proportion of the business men of all the southwest country in your judgment could be forced into involuntary bankruptcy under this $500 credit provision? vision

Mr. KILGORE. Well, sir, I suppose all of them—
Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Certainly, nine-tenths of them.
Mr. KILGORE. Fully nine-tenths of them. There is not a day in the experience of most of the small dealers in this coun-day in the experience of most of the small dealers in this country when they can not be forced into bankruptcy under this bill, and all their transactions with their neighbors vacated which may have taken place within the preceding six months. Can you afford to enact such legislation? And it may apply to other men besides merchants. It reaches all who traffic.

Mr. RAY, I want to call the attention of the gentleman from men besides merchants. It reaches all who traffic.

Mr. RAY. I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Texas and the committee to the fact that the bill as it now stands says that it shall be an act of bankruptcy for a debtor to transfer any of his property for the purpose of giving a preference.

And the bill further gives such exemption, so that under the last it now stands, if a debtor should transfer any of his property for the purpose of satisfying a debt which is preferred under the law of the State where he resides, he would be guilty of an act of bankruptcy, for which he would be thrown into bankruptcy at any time six months thereafter.

Mr. KILGORE. I understand that to be the rule, and that, I say, is the theory upon which the business of the country would be unsettled. No man would be willing to trust his neighbor.
No man would be willing to sell goods and take notes, for he would not know when he would be forced into the Federal court to litigate the question of his title, or the question of the collection of his debts.

Mr. RAY. At least the point I wish to make is this, that Mr. RAY. At least the point I wish to make is this, that under this bill, if enacted, a man should be permitted at any time to pay the debts that are preferred by the laws of the State in which he lives.

Mr. KILGORE. Now they undertake to catch votes by saying that all persons who owe debts, except corporations, may voluntarily take the benefit of this act, and everybody else except national banks and wage-earners—that would include lawyers—and people whose chief business is that of farming can be forced into bankruptcy. This bill does not provide for a uniform system of bankruptcy. Why not apply it to all alike? They could not afford to do it.

They say in the majority report, made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES], that the farmers do not ask for a coercive provision in this bill for themselves. Well, who has ever heard that the merchant in the towns and villages, retail dealer, wanted it? Who has ever heard that anybody else wanted it except the great wholesale dealers, the merchant princes of the big cities? If we are proceeding on that theory, then, air, we must strike out all of it that relates to any one except the wholesale dealers. They alone have asked for this measure.

The purpose of this law is to blackmail, to break down and The purpose of this law is to Diackmail, to break down and ruin the debtor who does not do exactly as the creditor wants him to do, and all its harsh provisions will be interpreted most strongly against him by his big creditors; and after they have stripped him of all his property and wasted it in expensive litigation in the United States court, then they will begin to consider the propriety of putting him in the penitentiary a couple of years for something he has done or omitted in the course of proceedings.

The pending bill makes radical changes in the rules of the criminal law as they have been understood and enforced in common-law countries. In our country an evil or criminal intent is an assential element in all felonious crimes. This intent must not only exist, but it must be alleged and proven like any other material fact. The bankrupt can be punished by two years im-prisonment in the penitentiary if he does or omits to do any one of the half dozen things mentioned in the following extract from the pending bill:

(6) made a substantially false valuation, as a bankrupt, of any of the property of his estate in his schedule of property, or omitted therefrom any of the property of his estate, or from the list of his creditors any person to whom he is indebted in a substantial amount, or included therein any person to whom he is not indebted, or included therein a creditor for an amount substantially more than the true indebtedness; (7) obtained on credit any property with intent to use the same to prefer a creditor or increase his property in contemplation of bankruptcy.

Now, if this measure should go on the statute books a debtor who has been unfortunate enough to have to make a pilgrimage through the rough and devious ways of a bankrupt court can be prosecuted and convicted and sent to prison for a term of two years, and yet the indictment need not charge him with the commission of any crime or the intention to commit a crime. he should make a mistake in the valuation of his property, or if by mistake he should omit any of his property from his schedule or the name of any creditor to whom he may be indebted in a substantial amount, or include therein a creditor for an amount substantially more than the true indebtedness he can be convicted of a felony. This, Mr. Chairman, is the complete and perfect measure which is so zealously commended to the House and the country by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES], who argues that it ought to pass without any material change in

Now, there is one other proposition in this bill which I desire to call to the attention of this House. I am not going to consume much more time. It is upon the subject of liens. They say here:

A lien created by or obtained in or pursuance to any suit or proceeding at law or in equity including an attachment upon mesne process or a judgment by confession, which was begun against the person within four months before the filing of the petition in bankruptcy by or against such person shall be dissolved by the adjudication of such person to be a bankrupt.

If any such lien shall have been realized upon, the amount shall be paid to the trustee by the officer or beneficiary, less the amount of the taxable costs which may have been incurred in good faith.

Now, sir, if a man has a transaction with a debtor who within four months goes into bankruptcy and buys a piece of property from him, and pays for it or advances money and takes a lien upon it, and the debt is paid by the transfer of the property, the entire transaction could be declared void and the party would

Now, after all this trouble is over; after the debtor has gotten through a court in bankruptoy; after he is broken up and his property wasted and all his transactions had within the six property wasted and all his transactions had within the six months next preceding the filing of the petition have been avoided, and after he has missed the penitentiary by the skin of his teeth and has commenced business again, this bill provides that at any time within two years after he has been discharged and started in business again, he can be put back into bankruptey on the application of a single individual, a stranger to the proceedings and without any interest in the estate of the debtor.

Mr. BOATNER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

tion?

Mr. KILGORE. Yes, sir.
Mr. BOATNER. You stated just now that there was a provision in this bill that repealed the criminal laws of the country.

vision in this bill that repealed the criminal laws of the country and authorized the conviction and sentence of a man to the penitentiary for having made a mistake—

Mr. KILGORE. If I have made any erroneous statement I would be very glad to be corrected. I stated just now that in prosecutions provided for by this bill the rule of the criminal law had been changed as to the essential elements of crime.

Mr. BOATNER. As to his assets, his estate, or the price of the property. Will the gentleman be kind enough to point out the section to which he refers?

Mr. KILGORE. It is that portion of the bill which I read and commented on just a while ago.

Mr. BOATNER. I do not find anything of that kind in the bill.

Mr. OATES. The gentleman has said that some creditor may make an affidavit that the discharge was fraudulently obtained. If the allegation of that affidavit should not be proved the discharge would not be set aside; and if the discharge were fraudulently obtained, ought it not to be set aside?

Mr. KILGORE. If I do not misunderstand the remark of the mark of the control of the set as a large of the control of the co

Mr. KILGORE. If I do not misunderstand the remark of the gentleman from Alabama, I certainly agree with him. As I was saying, this bill provides that any time within two years after a bankrupt has been discharged he may be thrown in the bankrupt courts again on the application of a stranger to the original proceedings charging that the discharge was obtained by fraud or perjury.

Mr. BOATNER. What will the gentleman do with the rule of law that requires that any suitor in a given case must allege an interest in order to have a standing in court?

Mr. KILGORE. That is the general rule, but the framers of this measure do not seem to have had much regard for general rules and general principles.

Mr. BOATNER. Does the gentleman understand that this hill proposes to repeal all laws and all rules except those incorporated in it?

Mr. KILGORE. No, sir; I am just stating what it does pro-

Mr. STOCKDALE. It is a new code.
Mr. KILGORE. It does prescribe a new code. I will just read what it says on the subject:

SEC. 14. Discharges, when revoked.—The court may, upon the application of parties in interest who have not been guilty of undue laches, filed at any time within two years after a discharge shall have been granted, revoke it upon a trial if it shall be made to appear that fraud was practiced or that perjury was committed by the bankrupt or any person in his behalf in its practicement, and that the knowledge thereof has come to the petitioners since the granting of the discharge.

Mr. BOATNER. It must be a party in interest.
Mr. KILGORE. That is true; I accept the correction.
Now, sir, a man can make the application if he was a party the original proceedings—a party in interest—any time within two years after the debtor's discharge, send him back into court on an application alleging that he obtained his discharge by his own fraud or perjury or the perjury of some one in his behalf. Thus, after a debtor has been discharged and commenced business Thus, after a debtor has been discharged and commenced business again, incurred debts, entered into contracts, bought and sold property, and prospered, perhaps, for twenty-three months and twenty-nine days, he can, on the application of a creditor, be carried into the United States court to try the question of fraud or perjury. His property acquired in the mean time may, by order of the court, be put in the hands of a trustee pending the trial. If it should happen that the charges were not proven and he were again set free, in nine cases out of ten his business would be ruined and his credit gone.

Mr. BOATNER. I will ask the gentleman whether, under the laws of Texas, any judgment of any court may not be annulled within the period fixed by the State law upon similar grounds, upon allegations that it was obtained by fraud and perjury?

Mr. KILGORE. I suppose a bill of review would lie in a trial court, or a writ of error to an appellate court, any time within two years. That, I believe, is the rule in Texas.

Mr. BOATNER. If a discharge in bankruptcy has been obtained by fraud or perjury and the facts can be established, can the gentleman conceive of any reason why it should not be set the gentleman conceive of any reason why it should not be set

Mr. KILGORE. No, sir; I agree with you that a discharge obtained by the fraud of the bankrupt ought to be revoked.

Mr. BOATNER. Then why does the gentleman attack that provision of this bill?

Mr. KILGORE. I attack it on this ground, that under this bill a discharged bankrupt can be ruined by this proceeding bill a discharged bankrupt can be ruined by this proceeding whether he be guilty of the charge or not.

Mr. BOATNER. Does the gentleman consider that a mere suit making these allegations would break a man up unless the allegations were substantially true? Does he find any provision in this bill which authorizes the court to take away the man's property or to interfere with it in any way pending that suit? How can the pendency of a suit of that kind injure the man?

Mr. KILGORE. Well, sir, you charge a man with fraud and he lives 200 miles away from the Federal court, and if any of the witnesses who have testified in his behalf in the bankruptcy proceedings which took place nearly two years before are found to ceedings which took place nearly two years before are found to have sworn falsely, then his whole estate goes back into bankruptcy. You charge him with the wrongful acts of his witnesses over whom he may have had no control.

Mr. BOATNER. Is not every suitor responsible for the testimony of the witnesses that he puts upon the stand and upon whose testimony he relies for a judgment?

Mr. KILGORE. I do not fully assent to that proposition.

The debtor might go to the penitentiary because somebody in his behalf swore falsely.

his behalf swore talsely.

Mr. BOATNER. Can the bankrupt be put into the penitentiary under that provision of this bill?

Mr. KILGORE. He certainly can, as we have seen, without being guilty of any crime, and can be dragged back into the United States court, and his property can be turned over to an assignee in bankruptcy, on the application of some party in interest stating that some witness swore falsely in his behalf.

Mr. BOATNER. But you do not confound that with putting him into the penitentiary, do you?

him into the penitentiary, do you?

Mr. KILGORE. It puts him on trial for fraud or perjury, and if found guilty in that proceeding, in which the rules of evidence are liberally construed against him, he would certainly be liable to a criminal prosecution under the provisions of this bill.

that it has property pending the proceedings if the court thinks it necessary for its protection.

Mr. BOATNER. I defy the gentleman to show a section of this bill that will interfere either with the bankrupt or with his goods until after the court has decreed that the discharge was obtained by fraud or perjury.

Mr. BAILEY. You can allege that he is about to dispose of

Mr. BATHEL. Tot dan alege that he is about to dispose of the goods, and pending the disposition of that question—
Mr. BOATNER. That is not what we are talking about now.
We are talking about the discharge, and I challenge either one of the gentlemen from Texas, or all of the gentlemen from Texas, to show a section of this bill which authorizes the discharged bankrupt to be interfered with either in his person or his property pending a suit to set aside his discharge.

Mr. RAY. I wish to ask the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER] a question at this point because he has made a statement I do not agree with. Is there any State in the Union where a judgment of a competent court may be opened or set aside because some witness upon the trial has committed perjury?

Mr. B ATNER. I think that certainly it can be in every State in the Union, if the testimony of the perjured witness was pertinent and material to the issue before the court. If it was the testimony upon which the judgment was rendered I apprehend that, under the general rule of law in all the States the judgment would be set aside.

Mr. RAY. Oh, no. It is expressly decided differently in New York and in very many of the States in this Union. I had occa-sion once to brief that question thoroughly, and I know that in a majority of the States of the Union it has been expressly held

Mr. BOATNER. I think the gentleman is mistaken about that. The statement which I make, and which I believe will be supported by the authorities, is that wherever a judgment is obsupported by the authorities, is that wherever a judgment is obtained by fraud or perjury, that judgment will be set aside. Of course if the testimony was immaterial to the issues in the case, then the judgment will not be disturbed; that is, if there is other testimony to sustain it. But if the perjured testimony was so material that the judgment would have been otherwise but for its introduction, I think the gentleman will admit that the judgment will be set saide.

material that the judgment would have been otherwise out its introduction, I think the gentleman will admit that the judgment will be set aside.

Mr. RAY. I never heard of such a thing. The gentleman will see that it would be always possible upon that theory to open and retry any cause on the allegation that some witness on some previous trial hadcommitted perjury, so that no litigation would ever be settled. I do not think the gentleman can sustain his position by the law of any State in the Union.

Mr. KILGORE. I do not remember, Mr. Chairman, what the rule is in Texas on the particular question raised by the gentleman from New York; but the reason of the rule as he gives it would, it seems to me, settle the question in the manner he has suggested. It is the purpose of the law and the purpose of the courts that litigation should conclude, and speedily, too.

Mr. BLAIR. Upon that point the gentleman from Texas will allow me to say I remember a case some years ago in my State, a divorce case, in which I was attorney. I endeavored to have the decree of divorce set aside upon the ground that the party had evidently obtained his decree by perjury—by his own perjury—not the mere perjury of a witness; but I lost the case.

Mr. KILGORE. Did that case go to the supreme court?

Mr. BLAIR. Yes. It was decided in the supreme court of my own State.

my own State.

A MEMBER. Perhaps the trouble was you did not prove the

Mr. KILGORE. I am very much obliged to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] for this illustration.

Mr. BLAIR. The general rule, I understand to be, is as claimed by the gentleman from New York; but in that case where I understook to have the decree set aside on the ground of the false swearing of the party himself in whose favor the decree had been made, the proceeding failed.

Mr. STOCKDALE. With the permission of the gentleman from Texas I would like to have another point cleared up.
Mr. KILGORE. Very well; I am in the business of clearing up points just now. [Laughter.]
Mr. STOCKDALE. Suppose a case such as that suggested by the gentleman from Louisiana, where a judgment is set aside because of the false swearing of a witness. Did you ever know any case of that sort in which the judgment creditor was put in the penitentiary because the witness swore falsely?

Mr. KILGORE. It would not be much more unreasonable to retry a man for a crime because he had been acquitted by the perjury of some of his witnesses.

Mr. OATES. That does not answer the question propounded by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. STOCKDALE], which was whether the gentleman from Texas had ever known of a man being put in the penitentiary for the act of another man, with which he was not connected?

Mr. KILGORE. I never have.

Mr. OATES. And I do not think anybody else has ever known such a cas

Mr. STOCKDALE. That was not exactly the question I put. Mr. OATES. And I do not think anybody else ever heard of Mr. STOCKDALE. But that is substantially what this bill proposes in reference to a bankrupt.

Mr. KILGORE. This bill proposes to convict a man of bankuptcy because some witness perjured himself in his behalf in Mr. OATES. Oh, no.
Mr. KILGORE. That is exactly what the bill provides.

Mr. KILGORE. That is exactly what the bill provides.
Mr. OATES. Oh, no.
Mr. KILGORE. If the gentleman from Alabama had paid attention to the reading of the fourteenth section of the bill in the course of my remarks he would not make such a positive de-

Mr. BAILEY. Will it disturb my colleague [Mr. KILGORE] if I make a single remark?

if I make a single remark?

Mr. KILGORE. It will not.

Mr. BAILEY. I want to say, in reply to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER] and his suggestion, that under this proceeding to review and revoke a discharge in bankruptcy, the property of the bankrupt, pending the revocation of the discharge, could be as much taken possession of as it could under the original proceeding. And I venture to say that if this bill should become a law, and if after the discharge of a bankrupt an effort should be made to revoke his discharge, the court would effort should be made to revoke his discharge of a bankrupt an hold that under this provision, on a motion to revoke the discharge and set aside the judgment, the property of the defendant can be subjected to precisely the same process as in the original proceeding.

Mr. OATES. If the discharge had been obtained on the testimony of a witness who committed perjury in giving that testimony.

Mr. BAILEY. You concede that?

Mr. OATES. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman from Louisiana denied that.

Mr. OATES. But do you say that any man ought to have a discharge by reason of perjury committed by another?

Mr. BOATNER. It seems to me gentlemen do not understand the position of this question.

Mr. BAILEY. I thank the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] for agreeing with me, because whether he is right or wrong the only question between the gentleman from Louisiana and myself was whether my correction or interpolation in the remarks of the gentleman from Texas was right.

Mr. BOATNER. The gentleman from Texas is talking against time, and I will ask him to yield to me a moment.

Mr. KILGORE. Well, I do not want to weary the House, but I will yield.

Mr. BOATNER. Section 14 of this act provides how discharges may be revoked at any time within two years, when—

It shall be made to appear that fraud was practiced or that perjury was committed by the bankrupt or any person in his behalf in its procurement, and that the knowledge thereof has come to the petitioners since the grant-ing of the discharge.

Now, I challenge the production of any provision of this law which either expressly or inferentially authorizes the issuance of any process pending the motion to revoke the discharge, which would interfere with, or deprive the discharged bankrupt of the possession and use of his property. If there is such a provision I should be very much obliged to the gentleman to coint it out. point it out

Mr. BAILEY. But the author of the bill concedes that there

Mr. OATES. Oh, no; that was not the proposition I assented to.

Mr. KILGORE. I will just furnish the information. Now, section 17 provides that the court may appoint receivers or marshals upon applications of parties in interest, to take charge of the property of bankrupts after the filing of the petition and until it is dismissed or the trustee is qualified. Besides, Mr. Chairman, if there were no such provision in the bill the court in the plenitude of its equity powers would have general authority to impound the property of a bankrupt pending the proceeding on the motion to revoke its discharge, if its safety demanded it.

Mr. BOATNER. But this is not the beginning of the bank-

Mr. BOATREL.

Mr. KILGORE. Oh, yes; it is the beginning of another chapter in the same proceeding. It is a proceeding to put him and his estate right back into court.

Mr. OATES. This is after the discharge has been granted and on the ground that the property had not been surrendered or that there had been fraud or perjury committed in connection with it.

Mr. KILGORE. Well, here is another clause to which I wish

Mr. KILGORE. Well, here is another clause to which I wish to call your attention, on page 60:

Whenever a composition shall be set aside or a discharge revoked, the trustee shall, upon his appointment and qualification, be vested as herein provided with the title to all of the property of the bankrupt, as of the date of the fling of the application for the setting aside of the composition or the revoking of the discharge.

Mr. BOATNER. What section are you reading?

Mr. KILGORE. Clause c on page 60. Now here is a proposition to put the man back into bankruptcy, and put all the property into the hands of the assignee, and the moment it is filed in the court, the court has authority under its general equity powers, without reference to this act, although it provides that it shall be done, to appoint a receiver and place him in possession of the property.

it shall be done, to appoint a receiver and place him in possession of the property.

Mr. OATES. That refers to the property remaining after the administration of the assets.

Mr. KILGORE. It refers to the property acquired after his discharge as well. It says so.

Mr. BAILEY. His subsequent earnings.

Mr. KILGORE. Yes, his property acquired inside of the twenty-four months. He is supposed to have no property but the earnings from his business after his first discharge.

Now Mr. Chairman. I have consumed more than my share of the earnings from his business after his first discharge.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have consumed more than my share of the time of this House in a desultory discussion of the provisions of the pending bill, and, having been treated with great kindness and much indulgence to-day, I will no longer make an assault on the patience of the members present. I have felt it to be my duty to the class of people I represent to condemn this bill in strong and explicit terms. The class I represent constitute more than three-fourths of the population of this Republic.
Their interests are identical, their wants and necessities are the same: they are the strength and support of this Government in same; they are the strength and support of this Government in war and in peace. If the pending measure should mature into a statute it would be immeasurably hurtful to them, and in their name I enter my earnest protest against the passage of this most pernicious, harmful, and outrageous measure. [Applause.]
Mr. OATES. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.
The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OUTHWAITE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 139) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, and had come to no resolution thereon

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

PURCHASE OF SILVER BULLION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 1) to repeal a part of an act approved July 14, 1890, entitled "An act directing the purchase of silver bullion and the issue of Treasury notes thereon, and for other purposes," the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. Peffer to the substitute reported by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, when I addressed the Senate last I stated that I desired to submit some remarks upon the appreciation of gold or the fall in prices of commodities. I had laid down some general propositions of monetary law that I desire to repeat in substance.

First, that the supply and demand of money determine its value, and that the amount of money in circulation determines the price of commodities. If a country has more money than the normal demand for it, prices rise, or, in other words, the money depreciates, and if a country has not enough money to meet the demand, prices fall or money appreciates. Thus we have the means of determining whether a country has money enough or not.

I think it must be admitted that the entire world is suffering from the financial depression that began in 1873 and which, with slight variations, has continued ever since. It seems to me it is very pertinent to the matter under consideration to determine what is the cause of the general financial depression throughout what is the cause of the general financial depression throughout the world, extending through a period unknown in the history of any other financial disturbance.

William Jacobs declared in 1830 that a general financial condition of the world must be produced by a general cause. It seems to me that is a proposition so plain that it is not worth while to spend much time in discussing it. I think it may be assumed that if all the world is practically in the same condition there is some general cause operating upon the finances of the world to bring about that condition.

I desire to call the attention of the Senate to some of the statements made before the Brussels conference as to the general financial condition of the world and the cause which has led to that condition. I find on page 127 of that report, in the speech of Sir William Houldsworth, a delegate of Great Britain, the following:

following:

1. That the depression dated from the year 1873 or thereabouts.

2. That it extended to nearly every branch of industry, including agriculture, manufucctures, and mining, and that it was not confined to England, but had been experienced to a greater or less degree in all the industrial countries of the world.

3. That it appeared to be closely connected with the 'serious fall in general prices, which even then was most observable, though it has since been more strongly marked, resulting in the diminution—in some cases even the total loss—of profit, and consequent irregularity of employment to the wage-energy.

4. That the duration of the depression has been most unusual and ab-

4. That the duration of the depression has been most unusual and abnormal.
5. That no adequate cause for this state of things was discoverable, unless it could be found in some general dislocation of values caused by currency changes, and which would be capable of affecting an area equal to that which the depression of trade covered.

I find on page 139 of the proceedings of the International Monstary Conference the speech and statement by Sir Guilford L. Molesworth, also a delegate of British India, with reference to the depression. He states:

the depression. He states:

1. That the depression which has occurred as a necessary consequence of the suspension of free coinage of silver in France was predicted, and the prediction has been fulfilled to the letter.

2. That since 1871 the population demanding gold has quadrupled, and the foreign trade demanding gold has trebled.

3. That the demonstization of silver for international monetary purposes in Europe has caused gold to perform, single-handed, the work previously done by gold and silver combined.

4. That the annual supply of gold scarcely exceeds the amount required for industrial purposes.

It follows, as necessary consequences of these facts, that with the increased demand for gold its value must rise, or, in other words, gold prices must fall.

muse tall.

The judicial blindness must be great which, ignoring this strong evidence of facts, seeks an explanation in irreconcilable theories.

The same speaker, on page 143 of the report, in speaking of the depression, and the use of gold, and the new demand for gold, etc., says:

etc., 83/9:

In 1883 Mr. Williamson, M. P., called attention to the alarming manner in which the reserves of the Bank of England had diminished from our inability to maintain them, caused by the competition of foreign nations for gold.

During the ten years ending 1889, the proportion of cash to liabilities had fallen about 30 per cent. In the year 1861 the bank reserves were £41,000,000; in 1891 they had fallen to £34,000,000.

During the seven years, 1833-1880, the Bank of France only changed its rate off discount seven times, whilst the Bank of England changed its sixty-two times, the variations in France only amounting to 2 per cent, whilst those in England amounted to 4 per cent. Mr. Goschen, in the House of Commons, said:

If feel a kind of shame on the occasion of two or three millions of gold be-taken from this country to Brazil or any other country, it should im-diately have the effect of causing a monetary alarm throughout the coun-

Then the same speaker continues:

Then came the Baring failure, and our weakness was shown by having to call France to our aid. The currency of France has weathered without difficulty storms to which the Baring failure was mere child's play; for example, the France-Prassian war, the communisticatinggle, the war indemnity, the failures of the Panama Canal, of the metal ring, and of the comptoir d'es-

the failures of the Panama Canal, of the metal ring, and of the comptoir d'escompte.

In contrast to this, I may quote from the speech of Mr. Goechen at Leeds his opinion on the gravity of the situation at the time of the Baring failure. On that occasion he said:

"You risked the supremacy of English credit—the transfer of the business of this country to other European countries. I can not exaggerate the immediate danger to which the country was exposed. You escaped from a catastrophe which would have affected every town, every industry; to use a common phrase, you have escaped by the skin of your teeth."

Mr. Giffen has stated that in almost every year since 1878 there has been a stringency of greater or less severity, directly traceable to or aggravated by the extraordinary demands for gold, and the difficulties of supplying them.

And, finally, we have the declaration of Mr. de Rothschild, which threat-them. And, finally, we have the declaration of Mr. de Rothschild, which threatens us with a monetary panic: "The far-spreading effects of which it would be impossible to forstell."

Fortunately England, although her currency was nominally monometallic, practically enjoyed the benefits of bimetallism until 1873, except when she had to depend on gold for replenishing her bank reserves, or when she had to make large remittances of silver to India; and then she had to pay for her folly in the shape of an agio for the privilege of choice of the particular metal she might happen to require urgently. If she could have satisfied her requirements by either motal, she would not have been put to this expense. Sut so long as Europe, as a whole, remained practically biths expense.

metallic. England, in all her vagaries was kept tolerably straight by the double standard of France, which preserved the ratio of gold and silver throughout the world, until the link was broken in 1873.

I repeat, "it is gold that is sick, not silver," and unless this fact be recognized by the members of this conference it will be impossible to apply the proper remedy to the crisis which menaces us.

The same speaker, Sir Guilford L. Molesworth, says in the beginning of his speech:

beginning of his speech:

GENTLEMEN: Our predecessors in the Paris monetary conferences of 1878 and 1881 were almost unanimous in the opinion that silver must be rehabilitated. They only disagreed on the method of rehabilitation. Some were of opinion that matters would right themselves, whilst others considered that the remedy could only come by reestabilishing the link that had existed between gold and silver prior to 1873.

The opinion of the latter was undoubtedly correct. Matters have gone on from bad to worse, and now we are confronted by the fact that Mr. de Rothschild, the most renowned financier of the world, tells us that "if this conference were to break up without arriving at any definite result there would be a depreciation in the value of silver out of which a monetary panic would ensue, the far-spreading effects of which it would be frightful to contemplate."

Plate."

Now, this state of things was clearly predicted by Elmest Seyd in 1871, when the severance of the link between gold and silver was first contemplated. His prediction has been so remarkably fulfilled that I must quote

From what does the Senator quote?

Mr. TELLER. I quote from Mr. Molesworth's speech, and he quotes from Mr. Seyd. I do not believe I have on my table the article from Mr. Seyd. Mr. Molesworth quotes him as follows:

It is a great mistake to suppose that the adoption of the gold valuation by other states besides England will be beneficial. It will only lead to the destruction of the monetary equilibrium hitherto existing, and cause a fall in the value of silver, from which England's trade and the Indian silver valuation will suffer more than all other interests, grievous as the general decline of prosperity all over the world will be. The strong doctrinarianism existing in England as regards the gold valuation is so bind that when the time of depression sets in there will be this special feature; the economical authorities of the country will refuse to listen to the cause here foreshadowed, every possible attempt will be made to prove that the decline of commerce is due to all sorts of causes and irreconcilable matters; the workman and his strikes will be the first convenient target, then speculation and overtrading will have their turn * * * Many other allegations will be made to tally irrelevant to the real issue, but satisfactory to the moralizing tendency of financial writers. The great danger of the time will be, that, among all this confusion and strife, England's supremacy in commerce and manufactures may go backwards to an extent which can not be redressed when the real cause becomes recognized and the natural remedy is applied.

I think that everybody will recognize that the dondition which

In real cause becomes recognized and the natural remedy is applied.

I think that everybody will recognize that the condition which was predicted by Mr. Ernest Seyd in 1871 has been reached. Every excuse is given, every cause is put forth as to the present financial condition, except the right one; overproduction, overtrading, and a variety of excuses are made, when the real cause is plainly in sight. If financiers and statesmen would not shut their ever to it. The same speaker Mr. Molecusch.

is plainly in sight. If financiers and statesmen would not shut their eyes to it. The same speaker, Mr. Molesworth, proceeds:

In fulfillment of this prediction, we find that the difficulties under which we labor have been attributed to all sorts of irreconcilable causes. It has been necessary to invent a theory that progress in manufactures, in improved transport, inventions, and banking have caused a species of economic revolution, which has created a new state in the conditions of trade and commerce differing from that which previously existed. But they overlook the fact that the alleged causes have been in active operation during the greater portion of the century (and when compared with the previous progress, they were fer more pronounced during the middle of the century than as present). It is obvious, therefore, that such a revolution, if it existed, should have arisen at an earlier period, and that it should have developed gradually, instead of setting in suddenly at the exact moment when the link was broken between gold and sliver. Moreover, this theory involves another irreconcilable position. It is absurd to suppose that a revolution of this character could have affected. Sliver is the standard of value of more than half the world, yet sliver prices have remained stable, whilst gold prices have fallen from 40 to 50 per cent.

I have read so much to show the general condition of the world.

I have read so much to show the general condition of the world. I want to read one other extract from the proceedings of this conference. I read from page 327, from the speech of Mr. Allard, a delegate from Belgium, a political economist known to the whole world. I am under the impression that he is a Frenchman, though he was a representative from Belgium at the conference. I shall have occasion, before I get through, to refer to him on I shall have occasion, before I get through, to refer to him on several points. He was speaking of the excuses which are made for the present financial distress throughout the world, and the general paralysis of business which existed, and from which we have suffered for eighteen or twenty years. He says:

have suffered for eighteen or twenty years. He says:

But we are told that if prices have fallen it is due to overproduction. Mr. Cramer-Frey has told us prices fall; that is very simple; it is because we produce too much. The homorable delegate from Switzerland is astonished that with their "juvenile ardor" I rise up against that claim.

If I should join him in telling you gravely that for twenty years all mankind had been so obstinate as to produce more than it could consume; that for twenty years, like the danaides, the universe has produced things for which it had no need, that it would not seem serious to you; and you would be right. That is, however, the paradoxical character of the singular theory of overproduction by which our opponents would prove that our privations result from an excess of production, and that labor engenders poverty.

I think it would be better to say no more of it, since facts within our knowledge make a formal denial of that claim. The stores are everywhere empty, business suffers on all sides, and the commercial world is invaded, as all admit, by an amenic influence which threatens death.

The statistics of Mr. Sauerbeck have clearly proved that the allegation of overproduction as a cause of failing prices is absolutely false.

Mr. HIGGINS. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HIGGINS. Will the Senator yield to me? Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. HIGGINS. I ask the Senator if he considers that the price of corn during the last eighteen months or two years was affected by the condition to which he refers?

Mr. TELLER. Does the Senator refer to the Indian corn, or corn in the generic form?

Mr. HIGGINS. I mean, of course, the American corn, maize; and also pork products, which, of course, are the product of the feeding of corn.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator will repeat that question to me five minutes later, I should prefer to answer it then than now; and if I forget it, I hope the Senator will call my attention to it. I should rather proceed for awhile with what I was proposing to say, and I shall reach that later.

Mr. HIGGINS. Very well.

Mr. TELLER. The same gentleman from whose speech I was reading said:

From 1860 to 1873 the total production of the world increased each year 2.8 er cont. That was the age of California and bimetallism. Prices increased

From 1860 to 1873 the total production of the world increased yearly only 1.6 per cent.

From 1873 to 1885 the production of the world increased yearly only 1.6 per cent; a decrease of nearly one-half. Prices should have increased, but on the contrary they fell 32 per cent.

This is the demonstration of Mr. Cramer-Frey's mistake in continuing to believe in overproduction, which was disproved long ago.

The truth, gentlemen, was told by Mr. Goschen, in England, in 1883: "The fall of prices comes from the rise of gold." He expressed his thought in these typical phrases: "Fortunate are they who own sovereigns, and unfortunate they who own commodities, products, and other goods."

Who are the fortunate ones of whom Mr. Goschen speaks?

The classes who receive fixed incomes in gold—owners of bonds of states, of provinces, and of cities, and of long-term leases.

And who are the unfortunates? The producers, the workers, and, in the first rank, the farmers.

Fixed incomes increase in value, products fall, and annuitants are enriched at the expense of labor. This is the truth, and thence arise, gentlemen, these conflicts of labor and capital in England and elsewhere, struggles against a fiagrant injustice which has been brought about between so many people; and this is a serious, profound, lamentable, but, above all, a formidable revolution, of which we feel every day the disastrous consequences.

You have beard Mr. de Rothschild, in the introduction to his proposal, praise the fall of prices, in which he perceived the happiness of the laboring classes.

History, as well as what takes place in our day, protest, it seems to me, against this judgment.

I lay down this proposition as one of the axioms of monetary law which will not be disputed, that prices are determined by the amount of money in circulation in a country.

I desire to read from the distinguished economist, Prof. Émile de Laveleye:

All economists agree that price depends on the relations existing between the mass of articles to be exchanged and the amount of credit or metallic means of exchange, due allowance being made for the rapidity of circulation

I do not know that anybody disputes that proposition. Who-ever does so, must do so in the face of the very best authorities

I find in the Fortnightly Review of September, 1893, an article by W. H. Grenfell, of England, entitled it Mr. Gladstone and the Currency;" and Mr. Grenfell states this to be the proper theory:

The quantitative theory of money is agreed to by all economic writers. If you increase the amount of money in a community, other things remaining the same, prices rise: if you decrease it, prices fall. The evils attendant upon a decreasing money volume have been so fully treated of by the old economists that it is unnecessary to enlarge upon them here. The nations of the world are decreasing the metallic money volume of the world by demonetizing silver. The effects of this can not but be most baneful, and it is England which, owing to her large trade with silver-using countries, and the large debts owed to her by silver-using countries, will be the greatest sufferer.

I read again from the speech of Mr. Allard, a delegate from Belgium;

To render money more scarce or more abundant is to make all prices rise or fall. An increase of money, as in 1850, corresponds to the growth, the progress, the life of society; monetary contraction will always lead to an anemia, sickness, and crisis.

If you diminish the quantity of blood in the human body will it not bring about anemia? Diminish the amount of money in the social body and diminution will bring about a crisis.

What we demand is that the blood taken from us twenty years ago be given back. History proves that we are right. When America was discovered, towards 1500, all prices rose in Europe in the exact measure of the quantity of money which arrived from the New World.

Now I will answer the question of the Senator from Delaware. Mr. HIGGINS. My question was whether or no the Senator did not recognize that, while wheat had been low during the did not recognize that, while wheat had been low during the past few years, the price of Indian corn had remained high, and that of all pork products, which are the result of the feeding of corn, was also high, and that cotton during a portion of the past twelve months was very high? I ask whether or no those fast are not contradictory of his theory that it is the demonetization of silver which has reduced the price, but that, on the contrary, it was controlled by the application of the law of supply and demand? mand?

Mr. TELLER. I recognize the fact that the law of supply and demand as to commodities is always in force, and while there is a general law operating upon all commodities with a downward trend, there may be special conditions and special circumstances such as for a time suspend the operations of that law. You can not lay down a general proposition which will hit every case in law, in economics, or in morals. There are always modifying influences. If the tendency is downwards through a long course of years, if it exists when the supply is great and if it exists when the supply is small, then it is safe to say that the ordinary law of supply and demand on that particular commodity did not affect the price, but that it was affected by some general law greater than that.

Now, I come to corn in this country. For a number of years the price of corn was low. We raised from 2,100,000,000 to 2,200,000,000 bushels of corn, and we consumed almost the entire crop at home. Suddenly the corn crop fell off nearly 500, 000,000 bushels, or about one-fourth, while the population had steadily increased, and while our export of corn has never been steadily increased, and while our exportor corn has never been large, yet it was then larger than it had ever been before. So here was a short crop of corn and a large demand, a demand that could not well be changed, because the American people are a corn-consuming people. We produce the great bulk of maize that is produced in the world, and we consume all of it, except from 3 to 5 per cent of the product. I doubt whether the exfrom 3 to 5 per cent of the product. I doubt whether the export has ever reached 5 per cent. It has been usually from about to 31 per cent.

The American people area meat-eating people. We eat large quantities of pork; and we are also a pork-exporting people. We export large quantities of pork. The country was full of hogs. In some sections of the country, with which perhaps I am more familiar than the Senator from Delaware, it is the principal business of the farmer to raise hogs to sell to the Chicago, Cincinnati, and St. Louis markets, where they are killed, packed, and averaged for deposite use.

and exported, or prepared for domestic use.

Mr. STEWART. And then, if the Senator will allow me, there was an embargo by several countries of Europe on our pork, which has been removed; and that gives us an additional mar-

Mr. TELLER. That is true. About two and one-half or three years ago, under the preceding Administration, the restrictions which had been put upon American pork in Germany and France were released, and our export in consequence, of course, increased.

As I was saying, however, we have a great stock of hogs in the country. Take the State of Illinois, with which I am somewhat familiar. I think that in a great portion of that State the farmers derive most of their revenue from the raising of hogs; and it has been so, as the Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER] tells me, for the last year, because prices had been extraordinarily high. Occasionally the prices of hog products have been high. high. Occasionally the prices of nog products have been align. I believe fifteen years ago we had just another such period of high prices of hog products. After that time the hog product ran down, and there seems to have been a supply greater than the demand. Our demand abroad was cut off by the restrictions imposed upon pork by Germany and by France. The last rise in imposed upon pork by Germany and by France. The last rise in the price of hogs was not entirely due to the supply being short or the demand great.

Many years ago, when I first began to observe this business and became somewhat familiar with it, there were a great many places where hog products were prepared for the market. It is not a great while since Cincinnati had the great packing establishment of this country and of the world; St. Louis was also a great place for that business, as well as many smaller towns, Kansas City, St. Joseph, and others; but lately Chicago has become the great market for hogs, and by a combination of capitalists and the manufacturers of hog products in Chicago they put the price of pork away up.

I do not know whether the Senator from Delaware has ever given much attention to this question, but it is a very common thing for a man to go into the retail stores of Chicago and buy a barrel of pork for about half of what the board of trade price is. I suppose the Senator would think that that was a remarkable state of things and could hardly account for it, and nobody could who had not given some attention to it. By the rules of the board of trade of the city of Chicago and other cities, I think, be a barrel of pork must be packed in a certain manner in order to be good on the exchange; that is, if a man goes upon the exchange and buys a certain amount of pork, he is entitled to have a barrel of pork that weights so much and shall have so many processing it. If there is a piece less or a piece more than is required by the rule of the board of trade he is not obliged to

So these speculators go to work and put up the price of the hog product to an enormous price and sell it on the exchange, as the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WASHBURN] knows very well, and force it up; and if a purchaser goes to a dealer in pork and the man wants to sell the pork, he unheads a barrel and cuts three or four pieces in two and puts them back; and then he says "that of the time in the city of Chicago for hog products. They put up the price of pork to an enormous extent; and I believe in a single day—if I am incorrect some Senator who is familiar with the subject may correct me-the price of pork fell $9 a barrel, or somewhere in that neighborhood, just when the combination broke down; perhaps it was more than that; it was enormous; showing that the price had been kept up, not by the demand, but by the combination in the interest of the speculators on the board of trade.

These two things have kept corn and pork above normal prices; first, a short crop; secondly, the stimulated and artificial prices of the hog products, which, of course, made the farmer anxious to sell his pork at a high price; but with pork and with corn the general trend for a number of years has been downward and not

In 1880, I think, or about that time, owing to the great demand, wheat was very much higher than it had been for a year or two previous, or a year or two later. In 1890 wheat went up very sharply because of the short crop in Europe; because of the In 1890 wheat went up failure of the rye crop in certain portions of the world.

All these things have to be considered in considering this question; but they do not at all interfere with the general propduestion I have made, that for twenty years there has been a downward trend in everything that has been produced on the farm, in the mill, and everywhere else.

Mr. HIGGINS. Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado has discussed this question with great candor. He did me the honor the day before yesterday in his speech to refer to a colloquy which took place between himself and me during the preternatural speech of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], when we were undergoing the test of physical endurance, in which, in answer to the Senator from Nebraska, I called atten-tion to the fact that the low price of wheat was due to the overproduction of wheat in America, which was then met by the Senator from Colorado with the prompt statement which he repeated the day before yesterday, that for the last twenty years the supply of wheat had remained practically the same, while the price had tended steadily downward.

Now, what I wish to call to the attention of the Senator from Colorado and to hear his answer in relation to, is the statement of this case, statistically and otherwise, made by Mr. C. Wood Davis, of Kansas, in which he called the attention of the country to the fact that, beginning after the lands in Kansas, Nebraska, and the Dakotas were thrown open to settlement, the Indians re-moved and Indian difficulties and depredations and wars stopped— from that on until 1886 there was an addition to the acreage of this country devoted to the cereals of almost 50 per cent, while the population was growing only at an annual rate of 10 to 15 per cent per decade, and therefore there was an enormous excess of production over consumption in the United States, amounting to a great deal when our wheat product reached 400,000,000 bushels, but which in 1891 staggered the markets of this country and of the world, even when there was famine in Russia, by a product of 610,000,000 of bushels. So that during the whole of this period the low price of wheat arose out of the unexampled increase of the acreage of wheat arose out of the unexampled increase of the acreage of wheat by the devotion to its culture of the treeless plains of the West, and, as I said during the discussion with the Senator from Nebraska, that, good Republican as I was, I was met the other day, as I am now, with the startling prediction of Mr. Davis that now, when the opening of the Cherokee Strip marks the ending of the last land for homesteading in America, it will be followed by a condition where consumptions are constituted by a condition where consumptions are constituted by a condition where consumptions are constituted by a condition of the last land for homesteading in America, it will be followed by a condition where consumptions are constituted by a condition where consumptions are constituted by a condition of the last land for the constitution of the last land for homesteading in America, it will be followed by a condition where consumptions are constituted by the last land for tion has caught up with production, so that in 1896 we shall practically have ceased to be able to export, but will eat up our own product, and the price of grain will be put up to such a figure before the election of that year that the Democrats will go into power for sixteen years.
Mr. TELLER. I hope

I hope not.
I hope not, too; but I mean to say, if the Sen-Mr. HIGGINS. ator starts this theory about silver and its condition putting down other prices, that he is met by other theories which seem to stand on stronger foundation. I shall only add, that the Senator anticipated further questioning from me by admitting the influence upon the market of the price of silver. He has argued to show that it put up the price of corn. What answer has he to make the Senator from Minnesota and myself that it put down the price of wheat, and that to the pernicious influence of the market wrecker is due the low price of wheat here and abroad?

Mr. TELLER. I will answer the Senator—

Mr. WASHBURN. Will the Senator from Colorado allow me a moment? Mr. TELLER. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota. Mr. WASHBURN. In regard to the question of acreage, if I am not very much mistaken in my recollection, in 1890 the acreage of wheat was no larger than it was in 1880.

Mr. HIGGINS. It was absolutely larger, but it was relatively smaller compared to population.

Mr. WASHBURN. If anything, it was only a trifle larger; it remained substantially the same, and the population of this country had increased to a very large extent.

I agree entirely with the suggestion made by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] in regard to the price of corn and pork, that it was simply artificial.

In all the discussions on the antioption bill it was admitted by its friends that there were short periods when the prices of products were increased to an abnormal extent, but that it was only temporary; that the ultimate result was that when the cor-ner or deal was broken the prices went lower than they were before. That has been the rule in every bull movement or in every corner that has been attempted in this country.

Again, in answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. Higgins] as to the overproduction in 1891, the wheat and rye crop throughout the world in that year was between three and four hundred million bushels short of an average crop, and yet under the manipulations of the produce exchanges of this country, more notably the Chicago Board of Trade, the price of wheat was broken down from $1.12 to less than 75 cents a bushel. This I claim and believe.

Mr. HOAR. Do these manipulations enable the manipulators to make a great speculation by selling wheat to the consumer for what would be a high price, or are they manipulations by which the manipulators get no substantial advantage by selling

Mr. WASHBURN. Of course, on account of the demand for consumption; that goes without saying. The price depreciated from $1.12 to less than 75 cents a bushel. I claim it was largely due to the operations and machinations of the gamblers in grain products of this country, and that the question of supply and demand really cut but very little figure in it, because, as I said before, the average of the crop of the world was from three to four hundred million bushels less than the average crop. course under these manipulations the question of supply and demand cuts some figure; but in the main the plain on which grain is sold is made by the manipulations of the produce exchanges of this country. So I think the Senator from Colorado is sound on this question, and if he were equally sound on the money question, and had as clear-an appreciation of that as he has of this question, I should be with him.

Mr. HIGGINS. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator from Colorado, but I have the figures before me, and I wish to call his attention, and that of the Senator from Minnesota, to the fact that it was in the period from 1870 to 1885 which marked the stoppage of the rapid increase in the production of grain, compared to the increase of population. The rate per cent of increase of cultivated area from 1871 to 1875 was 32.2; from 1875 to 1880 it was 34.1; from 1880 to 1885, 19.4, and from 1885 to 1890 it fell to 7.1, and has been much less since then.

Mr. TELLER. I will now come back to the proposition that the hog product, the corn, and the wheat crop have been manipulated by boards of trade. The price of wheat in the United States is fixed absolutely by the price of the surplus we send abroad. There is no question about that. When wheat is high in Europe it is high here. Corn is not affected by that cause at all on account of the small presentage of corn we send out of the all on account of the small percentage of corn we send out of the United States. It does not in anywise affect the price in the United States. So what could happen as to corn could not happen as to wheat, unless there is a system on the boards of trade in Chicago and all over the world, which nobody claims exists. The wheat price in Europe is fixed by the demand for it and for bread products.

Mr. MANDERSON. Let me suggest to the Senator that certainly the price of corn is affected by the shipment abroad of cattle and hogs, or rather the products of cattle and hogs?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.
Mr. MANDERSON. The Senator is, of course, aware that in the corn-growing States of the West the use to which a vast amount of corn is put is the putting it into animal form, and that is shipped abroad. So the foreign demand for the animal product would advance the price of corn.

Mr. TELLER. Certainly; what the Senator states is true of cattle as well as hogs.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Colorado that a great deal of the difficulty has arisen from the inability of many of the people in the United States on account of lack of employment, and scarcity of money to purchase the products of this country. That, as I understand, has had a very important effect upon prices.

Mr. TELLER. I was coming to that; and that is a statement which can not be questioned.

Do I understand the Senator from Nebraska Mr. HIGGINS. to say, and the Senator from Colorado to corroborate the statement, that there had been up to the time of the recent depression any serious or long continued lack of employment in this country? Certainly the tramp disorder did not exist largely in this part of the country until the tramp resumed his occupation in this Democratic Administration.

Mr. TELLER. We have nad times in the history of this country since 1873 in which there have been a great many more tramps abroad than anybody wanted to see; and that does affect

Mr. HIGGINS. If the Senator will allow me, up until between 1873 and 1879 was the time of the greatest depression, but after 1879 began the good condition, which has prevailed more or less up to this time.

Mr. TELLER. "More or less," and yet in 1884 we had a good deal of depression in financial circles, a good deal of want, and a great lack of employment and general complaint; and there has been a steady complaint in this country for twenty years of a lack of profitable employment. The conditions were better in 1891 and in 1892 than for a long time before, I think.

Mr. ALLEN. I desire to suggest this idea, that, taking the rations allowed to the soldier of the regular Army as a fair test.

of the percentage of the food product that is consumed daily in this country, we do not raise in this country a bushel of wheat subject to export, and have not for a great many years.

Mr. WASHBURN. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Delaware to the statistics in regard to the area of wheat from 1880 to 1890 to show that the decline in wheat has not arisen from that cause. In 1880-Mr. HIGGINS. Does th Does the Senator mean the decline in prices? Mr. WASHBURN. The area does not account for the decline in prices, because in 1880 the number of acres was 37,987,000; in 1890, 36,087,000, something like a million acres less

Now, I desire to say, in response to the statement made by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. Teller] that the price of wheat in this country is made by the export demand. Such has always been the theory in this country, up to a recent period, that when-ever there was any export demand the price of wheat was made in Murk Lane, and the prices here adapted themselves to the prices there; but in late years this has been largely, and in some years absolutely, changed—notably in 1891, the year we exported more wheat than any year since we commenced raising it, the price was not made in Mark Lane, Marseilles, Genoa, at Antwerp, or at any foreign point; but it was made artificially and arbitrarily on the Chicago Board of Trade. When it became known all through Europe that the crop of the world was short, as I said before, from three to four hundred million bushels, including wheat and rye, the belief became general that the price of wheat must advance and heavy buying commenced, and the exports for a while were very large; but commenced, and the exports for a while were very large; but just then the bears, the gamblers, and the market wreckers on the Chicago Board of Trade began to sell short and to get in their deadly work—offering to sell in Chicago enormous quantities of wheat that had no existence at prices for future delivery much less than the cash price, and continued this process through the entire crop year. That, of course, carried the price down in all the markets of this country, Europe, and the entire world; and for six months, as the Senator will find by reading the market reports of the world during that nearled the prices the market reports of the world during that period, the price was carried steadily downward by operations of this character. The dealers in Europe undertook to hold up the price, but it was continually knocked out from under them by the quotations arbitrarily made by the Chicago Board of Trade.

Mr. TELLER. I do not deny that the Chicago Board of Trade has exercised a pernicious influence on the price of wheat and other farm products

Mr. STEWART. And on silver. [Laughter.]
Mr. TELLER. Yes; I might include that. We have had sevearl petitions from that board of trade recently with reference to pending legislation. They take the same view of it that the Senator from Minnesota does, that it is very important for the general speculative interests of the country that the purchasing clause of the Sherman act should be repealed. That is the only interest that they have, and the only interest that the Senator from Minnesota has, if he will permit me to say so.

But, Mr. President, let us get back to the wheat crop. While undoubtedly in this country the Chicago Board of Trade controls to a greater or less extent temporarily the price of wheat when it is iluctuating, yet it does not control the export price. Half the time the price on the Board of Trade of Chicago is not the real price of wheat; it is but the speculative price. The price of wheat to-day will be 5 cents more than it was yesterday, and to-morrow it may be 10 cents lower than it is to-day, and going days. Then those speculators fail, and go into bankruptey. ing down. Then those speculators fail, and go into bankruptcy, and start in anew; but that is not legitimate business. It disturbs the legitimate business of the country. The question is, for what does wheat sell when it is taken to New York City, Baltimore, Philadelphia, and other cities of export to be shipped 40 Europe.9 Mr. HIGGINS. Mr. HIGGINS. I would ask the Senator from Colorado if the price in New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore is not daily controlled by the price in Chicago?

Mr. TELLER. Not always.

Mr. HIGGINS. It is the same, allowing for the difference in freight charges. Mr. TELLER.

Mr. TELLER. They are compelled in the long run to take the export price. When Chicago puts up the price of wheat 5 cents a bushel in one day, nobody exports wheat, and nobody gets any money for the wheat there. The farmers do not get the advantage of that. It is a speculative operation.

Mr. WASHBURN. In 1891 there was no putting up; the gamblers were selling short; and that continued a long time. If the Senator will take the pains and time to examine the quotations that were made from time to time during that year in every foreign port to which we export wheat, he will find every word I have said on that point absolutely corroborated, and that the price was not made abroad, was not made by the export cities, but was made by the Chicago Board of Trade by offering wheat which did not exist, but which at the same time made the price for all wheat in this country. The miller who bought wheat, or any one who bought wheat, had to buy it on the basis of the prices made by the Chicago Board of Trade. So it was at every foreign port. And it even went so far that the foreign miller, and the same is the case to day in order to protect himself sold and the same is the case to-day, in order to protect himself, sold wheat short on the Chicago Board of Trade, and helped to put down the market still further.

Mr. TELLER. Undoubtedly there was an extraordinary con-Mr. TELLER. Undoubtedly there was an extraordinary condition in 1891. In the first place, there was no wheat in Europe, compared with what there ought to have been. having a great crop in that year, all we wanted that year, were able in some respects to dictate, and did dictate the prices; but it was the only time that we ever did dictate the prices, and we where you send your surplus products is where the price of everything is fixed. That is an economic law that may be disturbed for a time, but, as a general thing, it is a universal law. It can not be disturbed except for a temporary period, I do not care what the product may be. Who fixes the price of cotton in this country? The people who consume it in Europe, because we can not consume the product of this country. If we could, we should fix the prices; but we are at the mercy of those people, and we receive from them what they are willing to pay us. We come in competition with Russia, with India, with Bohemia, with Turkey, and with other sections of the world that have wery much cheaper labor than ours. So they practically fix the price. I think that can not be gainsaid. Although there may be some exceptions with reference to the fixing of the prices of products in this country for the time being, yet that universal law when that exception arises is disturbed.

Now, I want to get back to the proposition of the Senator from Delaware. I do not happen to have seen Mr. C. Wood Davis's calculations on this subject, and if I had I do not know whether I should attribute as much importance to them as the Senator from Delaware does, because I am pretty familiar with this subject myself. I know that there was a great growth of farms and a great increase of farm products after the war, because I was in the habit, at least twice a year, of passing back and forth across that great country which sprang into civilization as if by

I have gone across the State of Kansas when there were no settlements except along the frontier on the Missouri River. I have seen that State grow to be the greatest farming State of the Union, producing from 74,000,000 to 75,000,000 bushels of wheat in a single year. I have seen those farms grow from wild prairies to a cultivated condition. I know those facts without any statistics from Mr. Davis or anybody else. But that condition had practically ceased to exist before the period that I referred to in my remarks the other night when the Senator was insisting that we had overslaughed the markets with our Western products, because that commenced in 1882, and Kansas had been practically settled before that.

I have before me a statement of the world's crop of wheat, and the amount of our crop and the acreage. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Delaware to the fact that the acreage in the United States in 1893 is considerably less than it was in 1882; that is, there were not as many acres of wheat raised in 1893 as there were in 1882, and but little more than in 1883, when the acreage had increased somewhat. If the price of when the acreage had increased somewhat. If the price of wheat is high one year, you will find a larger acreage the next year; if it is low, you will find a smaller acreage. The farmer who gets a small price for his crop one year is very spt to say to himself, "I will not put in so much wheat next year," and so the acreage goes down. On the contrary, if he gets a good price for his wheat, he puts in more the next year. In this way the acreage goes up and down. In the section of country where wheat is perhaps almost the sale error, there the acreage is more wheat is perhaps almost the sole crop, there the acreage is more

Mr. HIGGINS. If the Senator will permit me, I have not be-fore me the figures as to the acreage of land in wheat during late years, but, as I understand the figures, the large increase of acreage devoted to all the cereals and to farming purposes stopped relatively with 1885, and since that time the country has been vainly endeavoring to catch up with the unprecedented and enormous increase that occurred between 1867 and 1885. That increase was simply unexampled in the experience of the world; the great, peaceful march of the nations had known nothing like it before in the history of the world since the Huns and the Goths and Vandals swept with sword over western Europe.

Mr. TELLER. Let me call the attention of the Senator to the fact that is given here, and which I believe is correct, inasmuch as it corresponds with the figures given by the Agricultural Department, that in 1882 (which is the first year given in this statement) the acreage of wheat in the United States was in round numbers, 37,000,000; that in 1885, which he says was the culminating year, it was only 34,000,000; in 1882 the acreage was 37,-000,000, in round numbers—I will not give the exact figures—in 1885 it was 34,000,000; in 1886 it was 36,000,000; in 1887 it was 37,000,000, and in 1893 it was 34,500,000.

Now, let me give the Senator the crop for 1882. speaks of the great crop of 1891 being 611,000,000 bushels of wheat. The crop of wheat for 1882 was 504,000,000 bushels. The Senator must recollect that during those ten years we had an increase of population to consume that wheat crop. In 1882 the price of wheat is given in the Statistical Abstract at $1.19.

Mr. HIGGINS. That was one of the years when there was a great crop in the country Mr. TELLER. Still it brought a large price. That is what I wanted to call to the attention of the Senator, that it brought $1.19. The next year the crop was very nearly, but not quite 100,000,000 bushels short, being 421,000,000 bushels, and the price was $1.13. It certainly ought to have brought as much.

Mr. HIGGINS. I can refute those figures, if the Senator will allow me, from Mr. Davis's tables.

Mr. TELLER. I am not taking Mr. Davis's tables.
Mr. HIGGINS. Allow me to take them, and to commend them to the Senator's careful inspection. I am now giving him for the years 1882 and 1883 the world's production, and on the world's production in 1882 and 1883 there was a surplus of 216,000,000

Mr. TELLER. I will give the Senator the world's production. I have the whole thing here in a form which the Senator can verify by reference to the figures of the Agricultural Department. I know nothing about Mr. Davis's tables, except I know that he has been connected with the talk about the boards of trade a good has been connected with the talk about the boards of trade a good deal, and has had considerable to say about them. The Senator may take the world's product in 1882 at 2,270,000,000, in round numbers; take the next year, 1883, and it was 200,000,000 bushels short; it was short nearly a hundred million in this country. Yet instead of the price being $1.19 it was $1.13.

Mr. HIGGINS. Was not the surplus brought over from 1891? Mr. TELLER. There was not surplus enough brought over to make that difference.

Mr. HIGGINS. The world to-day is staggering under the surplus brought over from 1891.

Mr. TELLER. I have here a statement made by, I think, as good authority as exists. If the Senator would look at the facts he would not jump at conclusions as he does. Our surplus that year, 1882, was 98,000,000 bushels. Still the world's supply in 1883 was nearly 100,000,000 bushels short, including the surplus. The next year the surplus was still greater and the crop was greater, and the price was again less. So the Senator may run down the tables until he comes to the crop of 1891 or 1892. That is the years when there were great crops in Europe, and we also is the year when there were great crops in Europe, and we also had a great crop

This year we have 400,000,000 bushels of wheat and there are in the world 2,229,000,000 bushels; and yet wheat is cheaper to-day in London, Liverpool, and New York than it ever was before in the history of wheat. The surplus of last year was 135,000,000 bushels, while the surplus of 1892 was 171,000,000 bushels. The surplus is the amount estimated to be in the farmers' hands on the 1st of March, and added to the crop gives the amount available for domestic use and export. There has been no wheat sold in a hundred years in Great Britain for the price at which it is being sold to-day.

New York City, during the greatest panic which ever took place, the price was higher than now; within ten days it has been 66 cents per bushel; it has even been put aboard vessels within the last thirty days for 70 cents, and that was the best wheat from Minnesots and the Dakotas. It is not that the countries of try has a surplus product; it is that there is a paucity of consumption; it is that the whole trend of prices of all products has been downward; and you can not keep up the price of one product when the price of everything else is falling. It is caused by the contraction of money. That is what I desire to speak of. The only point to which I is end to address myself to-day is the question of the appreciation of money, which bears a close relation, of course, to the falling of prices.

Mr. HIGGINS. If the Senator will allow me, he has been fair enough to say that this effect of the appreciation of money has not been the only one that influences prices; that the law of supply and demand, the influences of market gambling, and other elements come in to affect it. But I will ask him if he does not consider that the price marked by grain in the United States, and, because of its selling price here, throughout the world, during the present depression and panic, has shared that depression with all other products? As the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WASHBURN] has so clearly shown here, and as we all know, it has been the subject of the market gambler in all the boards of trade, not merely at Chicago, but at New York and elsewhere, and along during June, July, and August of this year, and to the present time, there has been no supporting power; the banks have been unable to furnish money, and consequently farmers have been compelled to sell their grain for almost for farmers have been compelled to sell their grain for almost for whatever it would bring. I am very much in hopes, I will say to the Senator, that with better conditions that may come, the price of grain will go up; but he can not attribute its present peculiarly low price to the general law which he is arguing for.

Mr. TELLER. That is the very gist of the whole controversy. The Senator assumes that I can not. I have been trying to prove that I could. I have been asserting that. I have not denied that the present local depression has not had some effect upon wheat; that the shortage of money in the country may have renewheat; wheat; that the shortage of money in the country may have rendered it difficult for a man to move his wheat from Minnesota to New York. I have not denied the influence of the present financial depression in the United States upon the markets of Europe. Why should wheat rule in Europe lower than it ever ruled be-fore in the history of the world?

Mr. HIGGINS. Because they can buy it cheap here, and they

Mr. HIGGINS. Because they can buy it cheap here, and they have been doing it.

Mr. TELLER. If there was a demand for wheat and wheat was high in Europe they would send the money here to get it. It has been low in Europe. It has been going down there. It has gone from 45s. to 26s. Mr. Rothschild said that was a blessing, and I judge that the Senator from Massachusetts was inclined to that opinion by the question he asked the Senator from Minnesota when he inquired who paid the cheap price. That was the effect of his question. I do not deny but that when wheat goes to 50 cents a bushel the man who consumes it and does not raise it gets some advantage from it. The low price has some redeeming quality of course. It enables the manufacturers of New England to perhaps manufacture cheaper than they could with high-priced wheat. But I deny that it is a blessing to the country to have cheap wheat or that in the end it is a blessing to the man who buys it.

Mr. HIGGINS. I agree with the Senator thoroughly.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator has been very hasty in his deduction of my opinion from my question to the Senator from Minne-

Mr. TELLER. I will allow the Senator to give his own in-Mr. Hoar. I supposed that was what the Senator meant.
Mr. Hoar. I asked the Senator from Minnesota sotto voce, Mr. HOAR. I asked the Senator from Minnesota sotto voce, when he stated that certain manipulations of the wheat market in Chicago brought down wheat to the low price per bushel of which he was speaking, whether the manipulations enabled the manipulators in the view of the Senator from Minnesota to make a great speculation by selling it for what would be a high price to the consumer, when getting from the producer cheap, or whether they were manipulations by which the manipulators got no substantial advantage by selling it again. That is the question which I asked.

I will state, however, very frankly-and I do not want to prolong this discussion—that I quite agree with those who believe that high prices, as a rule, are an indication of national prosperity, and that low prices, and especially falling prices, are an indication of great national distress and decay. I do not believe, if I may add one sentence, that the manufacturers of New England, to whom the Senator from Colorado adverted, entertain any other opinion. They do not desire times of cheap wages as a rule. Of course there are contests which come about and there are manufacturers who are free traders, and have all manner of absurd notions as well as other classes of men; but the great bulk of the New England manufacturers never responded more heartily to any sentiment uttered in this country than they did to the sentiment so eloquently and graphically put by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] sometime ago, in which he denounced cheapness, and President Harrison expressed the same view.

Mr. TELLER. I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts, that falling prices are disastrous to business and not a sign of mational prosperity.

Mr. HOAR. And falling wages.

Mr. TELLER. And falling wages are the same. Of course the cheapness which comes from ability to produce with little labor and with little sacrifice is a cheapness that nobody objects to, because that puts within the reach of everybody the prod-

Mr. HOAR. In other words, you would rather have a State of rich and fertile land than cheap and rockyland. That is the whole of it

Mr. TELLER. Yes; if land will produce, as land will in some portions of the country, 40 bushels of wheat per acre, it enables the producer to sell the wheat for less than if it produced 20 bushels, and it is a blessing to him and a blessing to the country. What we complain of is a monetary condition that produces the low prices, not that nature has supplied an abundance of the things and enabled us to produce cheaply, but that we produce it on the same soil with the same sacrifice that we ever made and get less for it.

The Senator from Delaware says that I am fair enough to admit certain propositions. Upon these questions I never shrink from the logical sequence of my proposition. I never would assert that the monetary condition absolutely controls, and that nothing else controls the price of commodities. I have seen one commodity going up when hundreds of others were falling. It was apparent that there was some general law operating upon those falling, and that there was some special influence or law acting upon that which was rising. That might be because of an increased demand; it might be because of adecrease of supply. But what I am dealing with is the general rule. I am dealing with the general proposition that the amount of money in circulation in a country controls its prices; that the amount of money in circulation in the world controls the world's prices; and I have yet to hear anybody dispute that proposition.

Mr. HIGGINS. I simply want to understand the Senator's position. Does he claim that one country, with whathe would consider an abundant or a superabundant amount of circulation, could establish and maintain one price for wheat, and another country, with an inadequate circulation or a small one relatively. could have a lower price for wheat, and so on through the whole range of prices of commercial articles; or that there is a single

mr. TELLER. On Monday last, when I was on the floor, the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. Aldrich] put that question to me and I answered it in the negative. I do not claim that. It seems to me that it does not need any argument to explain my position on that point. Take the United States. If we have so much money that wheat goes to $1.10 a bushel and in England they have so little that it remains at $1 there will be a redistribution of the money in these days, when all the world is one commercial body. When all have the same kind of money and have a universal commerce you can not do that. The time was when a country would maintain its prices independently of every other, because it had no association with other countries.

I stated the proposition some days ago, and the Sonator from Nevada [Mr. Jones] in his recent speech reiterated the same suggestion. It is not new to either of us. It has been repeated. suggestion. It is not new to either of us. It has been repeatedly declared here that no country can keep more than its distributive share of money; that whenever a country gets too much money for its business, so that prices rise abnormally, the money will get out of the country, if it is money that can go, because it will perform more money duty, it has a greater command over commodities somewhere else, and it goes where it has the greatest command over commodities. If an owner of gold the greatest command over commodities. If an ounce of gold will buy twice as much goods in Europe as it buys here it will go If an ounce of gold to Europe. There is no law that can prevent it from going to Europe. The man who holds it here will see that it goes to Europe, because he holds the gold to command commodities.

It is only the miser who holds it when he gets it and prizes it for its beauty. The holder of money prizes it for what it will control, what it will buy, and so in the case I put, it goes to Europe. I do not pretend to say that we can keep the prices in this country at a height beyond those in Europe; and what I am complaining of is that we have done nothing to bring about a monetary condition all over the world that shall bring up prices; but, on the other hand, we readily receive from Great Britain a demand that we shall follow that country in our monetary system and follow in falling prices.

We have nothing to gain by cheap goods, we have nothing to gain by cheap labor, we have nothing to gain by getting a vast amount of products from abroad, because we do not get any in-terest from foreign countries. We are paying interest on our in-debtedness and Great Britain is receiving it. France and Germany and Great Britain are all interested in getting as much for their money as they can, and the cheaper things are the more they get. We have products to sell. Mr. HIGGINS. I suppose the Senator does not undertake to speak of the Democratic majority in this Chamber, for I have understood that they want everything cheap.

Mr. TELLER. I do not know anything about what the Democratic majority want.

Mr. TELLER. I am sure I do not know what the Democratic Mr. TELLER. I am sure I do not know what the Democratic majority want, nor what they propose to do. I know about as much about it, however, as I know about what the majority on this side of the Chamber want. The distinction between the majority on this side and the minority on the other is so trifling. far as this session has been concerned, that I do not know where the difference begins or where it ceases, and I do not know of anybody who does. They all seem to be in accord in producing cheapness. Every effort that they have made on both sides so far has been in favor of the reduction of the money of the country and entering upon a period of contraction, which all know just as well as I know means low prices. If that is Democratic doctrine, and cheapness is what they want, it seems to have pervaded this side of the Chamber quite as effectually, and I think a little more vigorously even than the other.

Mr. President, I was diverted from what I was saying by the question of the Senator from Delaware, with which I find no fault, because, as I said before, the question which I propose to discuss is the depreciation of gold, or it can be stated conversely by saying the fall in prices. I attributed the low prices to the scarcity of gold. I read to the Senate statements made in the Brussels conference to show the condition of the world. I did not think there could be any doubt what it was, but I wanted to put it so that everybody would admit that the conditions are as I claim. Therefore I presented those extracts.

Now, I assert that there is not gold enough in the world to maintain stability in prices as the basis of the money systems of maintain stability in prices as the basis of the money systems of maintain stability in prices as the basis of the money systems of maintain stability in prices as the basis of the money systems of maintain stability in prices as the basis of the money systems of the money sy the world. That has been practically admitted in the Senate for at least the last three years. In the debate in 1890, I believe one, you have got to utilize silver, the gold is not enough to furnish the metallic money required as the basis of paper money that is to be used; because it is conceded by everybody (it used to be at least) that all paper money should be based upon metal, either gold or silver. While that is not absolutely true under either gold or silver. While that is not absolutely true under certain circumstances and limitations, it is so nearly true that it is not inappropriate to state as a general financial proposition that the paper money of the world must be based upon either gold or silver. I do not want anybody to come to me hereafter and say that I insist you can not maintain paper money with full money functions without either gold or silver, because that has been done and that can be done under the limitations I mentioned in my remarks last Monday, and that point I will not go

There is produced in the world, I suppose, from $115,000,000 to $125,000,000 worth of gold every year. I do not myself believe the statistics on this subject are very trusty, and I think it is exceedingly doubtful whether the amount has not been greatly exaggerated within the last few years. The declaration that there is an increase of gold within the last few years I do not believe can be sustained. I should say myself that $115,000. 000 a year is very much nearer the amount than a higher sum, and I believe that is too much of itself.

But suppose $120,000,000 or $125,000,000 are produced, what amount of that is to be used in the arts, and what amount is to be left to enter the monetary system of the world? If Mr. Saue beck, a German writer of reputed authority, is to be trusted, very nearly if not all of that is absorbed either in the arts or in making up the loss from the present stock. So, although you may produce $120,000,000 of gold each year for a series of years, at the end of that time you will not have added to the world's

at the end of that time you will not have added to the world's stock of money. Of course you have the gold in watches, in jewelry, in dentistry, in various gildings and all that, but you have not added to the world's stock of gold money.

But, on the other hand, it is claimed that that is too much. We produce in this country about $33,000,000 a year of gold—a little more some years or a little less. If the Director of the Mint is correct, we use up of that amount nearly $20,000,000 in the arts in this country—considerably more than half nearly the arts in this country—considerably more than half; nearly two-thirds. How much it is somewhat difficult to determine; yet you can see readily that in making these calculations there is more probability that you get under the amount used in the arts than over it.

It is safe to say, then, that $20,000,000 of it does not go into money, and that the balance, $12,000,000 or $13,000,000, goes into money. If that proportion holds good in this country, it must money certainly hold good in other portions of the world; and the chances are that there is very much more of it used in the arts in proportion to the total product in countries like England, France, and Germany. In those rich countries where capital has accumulated and where there is great wealth they use more of it in the arts. So I do not think that Mr. Sauerbeck's statement is at all out of the way, that substantially the world's product is used up before it gets to the mint.

This matter was touched on in the Brussels conference.

This matter was touched on in the Brussels conference. have a memorandum somewhere, but I can not put my hand on it. Senators who have read that report will remember the statement made. My recollection is that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES] made the same statement in the speech that he de-My recollection is that the Senator from Nevada nvered here in 1890.

Nobody in Europe has ever claimed that more than 40 per cent of the world's product went into money. Suppose we say that out of the $120,000,000, 40 per cent of it, or I do not care if you say half of it goes into money, what would $60,000,000 of gold be for the increased commerce, the increased trade, and the increased population of the world? Absolutely nothing whatever. I figured it up once on that basis and found that when we had about sixty million people we would be entitled to an addition of about 6 cents per capita per year to our stock of money. 6 cents per capita per year to our stock of money.

There is not any surplus of gold in any country in the world. There is not enough gold in any country of the world. I spoke the other day of the scramble that is going on for gold. I read in my opening from the Brussels conference report the statement by Mr. Goschen. He felt a degree of humiliation that ment by Mr. Goschen. He felt a degree of humiliation that when the Bank of England lost a million pounds there should be a financial disturbance in Great Britain. Everybody knows that has been the case for several years. Everybody knows that when exports of gold go from the United States to Europe there is terror in all financial circles of this country, and, on the other ward when gold comes from Europe to us there is financial ter-hand, when gold comes from Europe to us there is financial terror in every portion of Europe.

The contest is going on now as to who can keep the greatest amount of gold. If there was a sufficiency of gold nobody would amount of gold. If there was a sufficiency of gold hobody would be disturbed when a small amount of five or ten million dollars went from one part of the world to another. It goes from England to France, from France to Germany, and is always doing money duty, always performing the duty for which it is kept and used. If we send $40,000,000 or $50,000,000 of gold to Europe in a few months, as we have done, or if it is returned in less time, as here been done, it is still doing money duty; it is still affecting as has been done, it is still doing money duty; it is still affecting the prices of the world. But there is not enough. I say there is a scarcity of gold. I will read on the scarcity of gold an extract from this report by Mr. Rothschild:

What took place when the late war broke out between France and Germany? The Bank of France not only did not pay its notes in gold, but a quantity of 5-franc notes were immediately printed, in addition to which the bank was authorized to issue more notes than it was legally entitled to do according to its charter. This did not prevent, nor would it prevent the French banker, from drawing bullion away from this market, either by sales of bonds on the stock exchange or by getting their bills discounted in the open market here. the open market here.

As regards Germany, that country has also certainly a gold standard, but it would be difficult, if not impossible, to obtain any large amount of gold from Berlin or from any of the branches of the Imperial State Bank.

Then, again, as to Italy, there is a large amount of gold stored away there, but, as in reality it does not see daylight, that country might as well not have departed from its paper currency.

This he was citing to show that England could not keep the gold; that if they should attempt to use gold and silver they would lose their gold. I have a little work here entitled "The gold and silver money, a vital British home question for rich and poor, learned and unlearned," by John Monteath Douglas, of London. It is a very well written work, and I desire to read two or three extracts extracts from it on this very question of the scarcity of gold. Speaking of the danger to Great Britain in losing its gold he says:

losing its gold he says:

Every year the number and power of great financiers increases, and the risk to the English money market from their overgrown operations, for which our system was never meant. Such movements had not been dreamed of forty-eight years ago, in 1844.

Long may it be before any such attempt here is made by powerful speculators. It might easily be done so rapidly that the effect would be disastrous in the extreme. There would be no objects to serve at a time like the present, when transactions in all sorts of produce, as well as in stocks and metals, are at a minimum, speculation dormant, prices generally very low, banks full of deposits for which the owners see no present good employment, and the reserve still above fifteen millions. But there are plenty of opportunities when these conditions are reversed.

Take a very different case. Some years ago the Russian Government had large deposits of money in London—some millions sterling—and was said to have asked for about three millions to be sent in gold. This at the time would have caused a sharp advance of interest, which was explained to the Russians, who accepted a moderate portion, letting the rest follow leisurely. But suppose the time had been one of those when it would have particularly suited the Russians to put our affairs into confusion by merely drawing their money out of bank in gold, as any one can do.

The Russian Government (according to the St. Petersburg Bourse Gazette, quoted in Statist of 22d October, 1892, and other papers here) has now on deposit in London about ten millions sterling, five in Paris, and four in Berlin, and has been drawing away some gold. Suppose, by and by, when business revives and the reserve falls, it suited the Russians, who are so roughly spoken and written about here in their financial and other affairs to take their money roughly—say in one week, or in two days—how would business and credit in London about deal for $50,000,000.

That is, if they should call for $50,000,000.

The same difficulty could not occur in Germany, because the silver thalers re still full legal tender, and the banks have plenty.

This is about Germany I read:

Just so during the Baring troubles the Bank of England had to ask for permission to buy three millions sterling of gold from the large stock of the Bauk of France, which was said to dislike this, but to agree at request of persons influential in both countries. The sum was small to that other bank but great to ours. The Continentals greatly enjoy the story, and frequently refer to this help in speech and in print, when anything brings up questions as to England's assumption of monetary superiority.

I will add to what Mr. Douglas says here, that they borrowed a million and a half pounds also at that time from the Bank of Russia as well as from France.

They don't mean to forget it. Happily the Americans had by that time got a considerable amount of silver coined, and "silver certificates"—we should call them silver notes—issued against silver, all legal tender, and these notes particularly popular as most convenient currency, equal to gold. Thus they had no dear money market, and did not need to draw on Europe for gold and so make things much worse, as otherwise they would have had to do. The Bank of England had once before to get assistance from the Bank of France some years before the act of 184. We before alluded to these cases of foreign help, but they deserve this fuller notice.

I think it is pretty well established (and I do not know that it needs any further authority on the subject) that there is a scarcity of gold in Europe, but I will read one other extract from the address made by Hon. J. A. Balfour, member of Parliament, in the Egyptian Hall, Mansion House, London, August 3, 1893. It is a recent statement.

Evils of a scramble for gold.

It is a portion only of the address that I read:

We have boasted that we lead the van of commerce, because we are the reat upholders of the single gold standard; and yet there is not a man, I enture to say, in the city of London at this moment, not a single man, who rould not look with horror and with apprehension at every other nation following so good an example. Was inconsistency ever shown in more ludirous colors?

It is right, apparently it is orthodox, to have a single gold standard, but let Austria have a gold standard, let India try and get a gold standard, but the other countries go in for a gold standard, and a tremor seizes every one of our commercial magnates; they look forward to the possibility of an immediate catastrophe, while they dread in the future that slow appreciation of the standard of value which is probably the most deadening and benumbing influence that can touch the springs of enterprise in a nation. Such conclusions, if they be well founded, and I at all events have most honestly attempted to arrive at the truth, may well "give us pause;" and I venture, if I may, earnestly to appeal to that portion of my audience whose minds are not yet made up upon this question to reflect whether, of all subjects which deserve international treatment, that of the currency does not stand in the very first rank?

That is a speech which I commend to the attention of some of the Senators here who seem to doubt the appreciation of gold.

As to the appreciation of gold directly, I wish to read from a little pamphlet published by Prof. Laveleye in 1890, who had written recently, just before his death, one of the most complete small works that has ever been written, I think, on monetary science. Unfortunately it has not yet been translated into English, and therefore it is not accessible to the average American. He was a professor in the University of Liege, in Belgium, and I believe had a reputation at the time of his death for exactness and correctness equal to that of any other European writer. He

The production of gold is insufficient for monetary wants because the mints are almost compelled to close up. The instruments of exchanges not being fed by an annual coinage of about one milliard of francs a year, as they were formerly, are contracting; whence the fall of prices, the essential character and cause of the present crisis.

This cause of the crisis, is seems to me, is undeniable: First, because it had been brought out into bold relief, with all its consequences, before events came to confirm this forecast. Second, because a crisis exactly similar to the one we are now undergoing was produced after 1819 by a similar cause. Third, because the explanation to which I have referred is in harmony with those principles of political economy which are least contested.

The appreciation of gold was predicted by a large number of scientists in Europe before there was any appearance of the appreciation in fact. It was stated by those who had studied the question that if an attempt was made to put the burden of international money entirely upon gold alone gold would be appreciated or prices would fall. Dr. Laveleye here cites some of these views. He says:

these views. He says.

I. The present crisis was foretold, in the most precise manner, by the most competent and the most various authorities. Let us first hear the bimetallists. Fourteen years ago Wolowski and Ernest Seyd foretold, in the following terms, the inevitable consequences of the demonetization of silver by a great state, although they did not then foresee a general proscription of the white metal, such as has taken place since; First. Trade will declin, especially in the countries which have the largest commerce with foreign countries; second, the fall of prices will cause great injury to manufactures, merchants, and farmers, and hence to their workmen; it will be of advantage only to fund-holders and to holders of coin; third, industry being affected disadvantageously in its profits, fewer new ventures will be made; fourth, in this period of depression, the cause of which will not be understood, recourse will be had to expedients which will aggravate the evil, and among these expedients will be protective tariffs.

"If you suppress silver as a motor of circulation," said Mr. Wolowski to the monetary commission, on the 7th of April, 1870, "you will diminish the metallic mass intended to serve as an instrument of exchange the world over. A large fall of prices will be the necessary consequence of the scarcity of the white metal. Lands, for instance, will be sold for a less quantity of money; the land-owner will find himself between two fires and will be injured in both directions. Land will decline in price and the mortgage it has to bear become heavier."

Léon Faucher, as far back as 1843, predicted the actual crisis in still stronger

Léon Faucher, as far back as 1843, predicted the actual crisis in still stronger

Leon Faticiter, as in case, as 1990, predicted the actual crisis in still stronger terms:

"The Government, he said, can not prescribe that the type of value shall henceforth be gold instead of silver, for to prescribe that it should would be to decree a revolution, and the most dangerous of all revolutions, one whose course would be towards the unknown." (Recherchés sur l'or et l'argent 6.

104.) Let us hear now the monometallists.

The Economist also foresaw the danger from afar. In 1860, in its review of the year, it wrote substantially as follows:
"We may afirm that the actual production of gold of £30,000,000 (now reduced to twenty millions) is scarcely sufficient to meet the increasing transactions of the commerce of the world and to prevent a sudden reduction of prices and wares."

"We may amm that the actual production of gold of £29,000,000 (now reduced to twenty millions) is scarcely sufficient to meet the increasing transactions of the commerce of the world and to prevent a sudden reduction of prices and wages."

In its review of March, 1873, it predicted the disastrous consequences of the adoption of gold monometallism by Germany, and it added; "Unless the annual production of gold suddenly increases the monetary markets of the world will probably be subjected to a great perturbation by this scarcity of specie."

Lord Beaconsfield expressed himself in the same way. He said: "I attribute the monetary disturbances which affect business transactions so disastrously to the changes which the governments of the continent have introduced into their standard of values. Our gold standard is not the cause but the consequence of our commercial prosperity. It is evident that we should prepare ourselves for great disturbances in the business market, occasioned not by speculation or by some cause long known, but by a new cause, the consequence of which is very disastrous." (D'Israell, at Glasgow, November, 1873.)

On March 29, 1879, speaking of the depreciation of silver, Lord Beaconsfield said:

"The product of the gold mines of California and Australia have modified their dimensions."

On March 20, 1878, speaking of the depreciation of shver, Lord Besconselid said:

"The product of the gold mines of California and Australia has constantly diminished, and, at the same time, several governments have modified their monetary system in favor of gold, and this notwithstanding the continued increase of population, which always requires a great increase of gold coin to effect exchanges. The latter has diminished from year to year, and the result of it is a situation the reverse of that which the discovery of the placer mines had brought about. Gold is acquiring greater value every day, and, consequently, prices are diminishing in proportion."

Mr. Robert Giffen, chief of the English bureau of statistics, whose competency in the question of prices is fully equal to that of Toole, of Newman, and of Jevona, said, on the Sist of January, 1879, to the society of statistics, after he had demonstrated the reality of the fall of prices due to monetary contraction:—

It must be borne in mind that Mr. Giffen is one of the most distinguished monometallists of Great Britain, holding high public position. Mr. Giffen said:

We must express the wish that the countries in which silver circulates shall not replace any part of that metal by gold. That would be nothing less than a calamity to business, if a demand for gold similar to that of the United States and Germany were produced. Even a much smaller demand for gold would soon be attended by very serious consequences.

I might read, as I will read later, some further extracts with reference to this very question.

At the monetary conference of 1878, Mr. Goschen said, on the 19th of August, that to wish to introduce the gold standard everywhere was a piece of ntopianism, not only erroneous but dangerous. He adds: "In that case, the general effort which would be made on every hand to get rid of the white metal might occasion the greatest disorders in the economic world, and produce a crisis more disastrous than any within the memory of man." Has Mr. Goschen not been a good prophet? All the states of Europe have procribed silver and adopted the gold standard practically if not legally, and the crisis foretold by the eminent English statesman is unfolding under our the crisis forced by the chimete English seatestant is united by the cycs.

Mr. Soetbeer, the learned advocate of German monometallism, writes in the Jahrbücher für National-Economie, July 15, 1880, page 129, speaking of the general adoption of the gold standard:

"This solution of the monetary question would doubtless be theoretically the best, but the impossibility of realizing it in practice is so plain, that it is useless to stop to discuss a measure, the consequence of which would be the depreciation of silver and an absolute, incalculable decline of all prices."

I might read a great number of prophecies of this character.

I pass out:
Between 1870 and 1885 economic progress was also considerable, but less than during the previous period, and nevertheless prices fell to a lower level than in 1850. How, then, can it be denied that monetary contraction was the cause of this? According to Mr. Sauerbeck, production in England between 1870 and 1870 lacreased 21 per annum, and between 1870 and 1885 11 only; while prices rose during the first mentioned period from 18 to 20 per cent, and fell during the second 30 per cent.

He refers again to the work of Mr. Douglas from which I have read, speaking of the appreciation of gold. He quotes Mr. Robert Giffen, and I desire to read that as the statement of the most distinguished monometallists of Great Britain as to the apprecia-tion of gold:

tion of gold:

The appreciation of gold is most fully and admirably proved and illustrated by Mr. R. Giffen, of the board of trade, in his long and elaborate essay on "Recent changes in prices," etc., dated December, 1883, and published in the Journal of the Royal Statistical Society for that month, pages 713-815. Unfortunately, that precious essay is not included by him in his recent volume, "The case against himetallism," a reprint of his other and much less valuable papers bearing on this subject. That omitted essay affords one of the best answers to all the others on one of the great leading points of the currency question—the supposed steadiness of gold as a standard of value. I therefore must offer some extracts from this part of its contents, because comparatively few have access to the journals of the learned societies, and ordinary people are repelled by these being too often dry as well as learned.

After mentioning his paper in same Society's Journal in March, 1879, on "The Fall of Prices since 1873," in which he suggested that appreciation of gold had begun, or soon would do so, and his reiteration of this suggestion in an essay in 1885, he notices the fulfilment of his forecast by the sumitted general fall of prices, amounting to an appreciation or rise in the purchasing power of gold. This conclusions he establishes (pages 730-722) by detailed references to the tables and index numbers or averages of the Economist, Mr. Sauerbeck, Mr. Soetbeer, the board of trade, and the American averages. His conclusions from these as to appreciation of gold are doubtless incontrovertible.

averages. His conclusions from these as to appreciation of gold are doubless incontrovertible.

As to sliver, he says (page 740): "If we avoid extreme years the average fall in commodities measured by gold rather exceeds the average fall in sliver measured by gold. In other words, instead of speaking of the depredation of sliver," as compared with gold, "we should be quite justified in speaking of the appreciation of sliver when we measure it by the average of commodities," which is the way in which he and all competent persons now and in former times have measured the values of bold gold and sliver. After stating many interesting facts and arguments, he romarks (page 750): "We can say positively that the recent change from a high to a low level of prices is due to a change in money, of the nature, or in the direction of absolute contraction." And then he shows how the excess of imports of gold into England over exports of it in the fourteen years, 1858-1871, reached sixty-seven and three-quarter millions sterling of not import, or an average of about five millions annually, while in the following sixteen years, 1872-1887, the net import was under three-quarters of a million yearly, or eleven and one-half millions in all; whereas, if it had continued on the same scale as before, it should have approached eighty millions.

Thereupon he proceeds (page 763): "It is clearly impossible to contend there has been no change in the movement of gold, comparing the one period with the other. If we look at coinage or other details, the result would be the same. The stock of gold in England available for money has not been added to of late years as it was in the period just before. The stock with the additions has had to do more work, and it has only been able to do so because prices have tailen, and incomes have not risen, whereas from 1850 to 1878, when gold was going so largely into England, not only did prices rise a little but incomes a great deal." He adds that he believes the comparison would be still more striking "if we could compare the excess of gold imports from 1850 downward. But there are no official gold statistics before 1858."

would be still more striking "if we could compare the excess of gold imports from 1850 downward. But there are no official gold statistics before 1858. And further:

"The common opinion then" (in 1872 as to gold appreciation) "was different. It was freely said that as there was so much gold about, there was enough for every purpose, and prices (of commodities) would rise further." But the method of measuring and comparing the supplies of gold, as above "made a true forecast possible." And therefore he said in 1883, at the Bankers Institute, when Mr. Goschen gave his invaluable address, proving the rise of gold and its vast upsetting effects, that if the supply of new (gold) money were not sufficient to keep up the equilibrium looking to the increase of the population and wealth, etc., of the gold-using countries (page 755), "then we may have a long-continued fall of prices from generation to generation, and this will probably have very great effects as time goes on."

He then deals with the effects of this appreciation of gold on the distribution of wealth, and says (page 759): "It is obvious beyond all question that these effects may be important." "The debtors pay more than they would otherwise pay, and the creditors receive more. The matter is thus not unimportant to the two large classes of people who make up the community. Appreciation is a most scrious matter to those who have debts to pay. It prevents them gaining by the development of industry as they would other wise gain."

otherwise pay, and the creditors receive more. The matter is thus not unportant to the two large classes of people who make up the community Appreciation is a most serious matter to those who have debts to pay. It prevents the matter is thus not unportant to the two larges of people who make up the community Appreciation is a most serious matter to those who have debts to pay. It prevents the matter is thus who was the surplus value of many estates, especially of land, and also estates of other sorts, and made them insufficient effect on stocks of various sorts.

Hepointed out then, in 1888 (page 762), the prospect of "troublous times for instance, both for some of our Australian colonies and for a country like the Argentine Republic, even if the appreciation does not grow more serious than it has been. That the pile of debts has to be paid, principal and interest, in appreciating money, is a most serious consideration." We have already seen his forecast on these points asily verified. Of course, there was overborrowing besides. Rising gold with falling wool, grain, and other produce contributed obviously and seriously to the results. Wool and grain, like silver, are (according to his opinion) said to "fall" because gold gets dearer, and you can buy more wool and grain with the same amount of gold. But the debtors have to send so much more wool and grain annually to Europe in payment of the same interest. This must be irritating to the borrowers, who are called to bear much heavier burdens than they undertook. They will prove unable to pay. And nothing could more reasonably, or at least plausibly, be made an excuse for repudiation or for cutting down the principal or interest to be paid.

Then he turns (page 763) to look at the probable course of prices in the future as affected by the probable "continued pressure on gold, against which the only compensation would be a more extended use of economizing expedients." "Such economizing expedients will in fact, as I believe in the fact the probable of the strong pro fluctuation in silver. Wages always differ much locally, even in the various parts of England.

The evidence before the gold and silver commission was very largely about wages and retail prices. These move very slowly. Many "economists thought they should rapidly show results, in various places, by rise or fall, according to the rise or fall of silver and gold," but got no results worth mention. Let any one compare the steady price of bread in London for many years past with the fluctuations and cheapening of wheat.

Mr. Giffen's easay, which I have so largely quoted, was written by him with the reports and evidence published by the gold and silver commission before him. He had himself a very prominent place among their witnesses. He is a strong gold menometallist. Yet with all that information fully known and understood by him, he concluded as stated, that in relation to commodities gold had risen greatly, and silver had not fallen; and that the divergence seemed likely to continue and increase indefinitely, gold getting scarcer in proportion to the demand. (See also pages 24, 25.)

Other interesting writings by advocates of the English gold currency accept its appreciation and discuss the effects of that. I see no one seriously attempt to prove the reverse now. The question seems to be avoided. The epponents of bimetallism fight their battle, as Mr. Giffen continues to do, on other grounds.

On this subject I desire to read from Mr. Goschen, member of Parliament, in an address delivered before the Institute of Bankors in England, April 18, 1883:

ors in England, April 18, 1883:

Let us now assume what I think is probable enough, that there will be a continuance of low prices—that is to say, a continuance of the increased value of the sovereign. Two classes would be permanently affected: one is the class which is entitled permanently to receive a given amount of sovereigns. They will be much better off. The class of debtors, on the other hand, who are bound to pay a given amount of sovereigns for a long period to come, will be much worse off. In the same way as the rise in prices generally is to the advantage of the debtor, so a fall in prices will be to his disadvantage. And that leads me to another consideration. In examining the fall in price of various commodities, I did not allude to the value of consols and of securities. Have they fallen? No, they have not fallen. Ought they to have fallen? No, they ought not to have fallen. According to the theory they ought to have risen. Why? Because consols mean the right of the holder to a given number of sovereigns; and consols, and railway debentures and other such instruments which give the holder a right to a certain number of sovereigns, ought to have arisen, and they have risen. This squares entirely with the theory of the increased value of the purchasing power of gold. In the same way as commodities, measured by gold, have fallen, these which entitled the holder to a certain number given amount of gold ought to rise, and they have risen.

the same way as commodifies, measured by good, have indeed, the centiled the holder to a certain number given amount of gold ought to rise, and they have risen.

Let us proceed in inquiring what will be the effect upon various classes of the country on the assumption of the increased purchasing power of gold? As to the fundholder, I need not say any more. He will gain. He will receive his £3 per £100, and those £3 will be worth more than they were before. But perhaps they might be worth so much more that cansols may rise beyond £100, and it may very likely occur to a chancellor of the exchequer that the fundholder, If the position admits of it, should have his interest reduced from £3 to £2 Lise, or possibly £2 100.

Now let me pass to another class. The holders of mortgages would be in a distinctly favorable position. While the mortgages run they will continue to receive a sum which will represent a larger purchasing power than it did before. Those on the other hand who have borrowed on mortgage will be in a worse position. They will be under contract to pay a given sum, which measured by the value of all other commodities, will represent a greater value than before. To obtain that sum which they have to pay they would have to part with a greater quantity of commodities. The influence of this circumstance on landowners will not be overlooked. Landowners who have borrowed largely on their estates will be under contract to pay away a sum which represents more value than before, while the produce of the land, if ultimately that produce should generally fall in price like other commodities, would not secure the same amount of sovereigns.

It is impossible to see how farmers should be able to continue to pay the same amount of sovereigns for rent, if the prices of what they raise from the soil should permanently fall.

I have read some extracts from Mr. Allard's speech made in the Brussels conference, and I wish to read an extract from another speech made at the conference. Speaking of his former speech,

I showed you—Mr. Jones has recalled it—how Mr. Goschen called attention at London in 1883 to the fall of prices and the rise of gold which was already visible.

In 1865 Mr. Goschen went to Manchester to give warning of the same danger.

In 1886 it was not Mr. Goschen, but the English Government which was concerned at the slacking of trade, and which appointed the well-known Commission on the Depression of Trade.
The following year, in 1887, Mr. Goschen again went to Manchester. He said to the manufacturers, "Take care. Gold is increasing in value, prices are falling, and a crisis menaces us."
In 1884 he English Government, becoming more and more concerned, appointed the Gold and Silver Commission.
In 1889 Mr. Goschen, who had become chancellor of the exchequer, ever more and more uneasy in regard to the appreciation of gold, proposed the establishment of one-pound notes. The number of pounds in circulation was insufficient.

He says on the next page (page 322):

I have shown you that the real evil followed not from the fall of sliver, but from the appreciation of gold. Have you not heard from the delegates of Mexico that in theirs, a producing country, where the circulation consists solely of sliver and where if that metal had been depreciated it would have been felt soonest of all, that the imaginary depreciation had never existed. Silver, they tell us, still buys in Mexico the same quantities as before.

That statement I made on the floor the other day, and this is a verification of it, because the Mexican delegates had made that statement, and were sitting in the conference when Mr. Allard was speaking:

It seems to me therefore obvious that it is the operation of the appreciation of gold which makes us believe in the depreciation of silver.

On page 324 he says:

As to the fall of silver there is none except that which we have created for ourselves in Europe, where silver is valued in gold. We have seen that there is no fall of silver besides that which we ourselves bring about in measuring it with gold, which is scarce. We are like children who make a shadow on the wall and are as alarmed at it as if it were a reality. I think that if we had been more reasonable, and if, instead of demonetizing silver in 1873, we had opposed that measure as we opposed the demonetization of gold in 1860, the shadow which we have created would never have existed, and we would still be in that era of prosperity which we regret to-day.

On page 326 he says:

It was for the same reason that gold appreciated, that it bought more and more commodities, and prices fell in consequence. This is a great revolution in which all take part, and which prevails in England more than anythere less.

Again, on page 329, he says:

The fall of silver is obstinately spoken of, and the rise of gold is obstinately denied. Consider Mexico, where silver is produced. The metal is not depreciated there, for it buys as many commodities as before. "No matter," say the monometallists. "silver is depreciated, for we see that it is." But," you tell them, "there is a crisis everywhere." "There is no crisis," they reply. "But," you say, "gold is more and more appreciated." "Quite wrong," they say, "there is no appreciation of gold; there is only overpro-

I have already read from the remarks by Sir William Houldsdelegate of Great Britain, on one point, and now I desire to read from him on another:

to read from him on another:

What is necessary for England is equally, necessary for all the industrial nations of the world. Their interests in this matter are identical. Commerce is the great bond which unites all nations into one great international family, so that what prejudicially affects one must inevitably react prejudicially upon others. All, therefore, are equally interested in securing a common and secure basis for international trade. It is said that "the appreciation of gold has never been proved." If there has been a general fall in gold prices that is the proof. The one expression is the converse of the other. They are only two ways of stating the same fact. Metallic money as a medium of exchange, as the tangible payment of debts, may have decreased (as some assert), credit instruments may or may not have taken their place.

But this is no answer. The broad fact still remains that a general fall of gold money prices has taken place (no one with the evidence before him can dispute that), therefore that of itself is all the proof required that the quantity of the commodities are measured has not kept pace with the quantity of the commodities which it measures. This can only be called an appreciation of gold.

The course of silver prices further fillustrates this point. There the measuring commodity (siver) has kept pace with the commodities which it is called upon to measure in silver-using countries. Therefore silver prices have not fallen. There has been no appreciation of silver. I am glad to find that my honorable colleague, Mr. Rothschild, does recognize the "grievances" of India.

That is as much as I care to read on that point. I read again from the compromise proposed, presented by Mr. Alphonse Allard, delegate of Belgium and Turkey to the conference, on page 191 of this report:

This crisis, which was foretold in 1870, is now, it is said, in action. The disturbances which it produces are the more unjust and the more profound since the fall in prices is not produced by the development of labor or by the abundance of wealth, but by an artificial cause, which is none other than the law proscribing silver and thereby producing appreciation of gold.

No variation in the level of prices can be observed in silver countries. It follows, therefore, that the depreciation of silver in Europe is only produced by the appreciation of gold.

It is said that this artificial fall in prices, caused by the appreciation of gold, has for its results terrible social inequalities, the ruin of our agriculture, the slackness of our industries, the distress of our workmen, and the uneasiness which prevails everywhere.

For twenty years there has been a continual endeavor on all sides to find some other cause, but none has been discovered; and therefore no more effectual remedy has been found than the monetary remedy. It appears to me that the task to which this conference of 1892 is specially called is to counteract the evil of the fall of prices and the artificial appreciation of gold, and to combat the instability of exchange between the gold countries which constitute one-thirds of the world, and the silver countries which form the other two-thirds.

I do not desire to tire the Senate, nor take the time of the

I do not desire to tire the Senate, nor take the time of the Senate unnecessarily, but it seems to me that the question whether gold has appreciated or silver has fallen is, after all, the vital question. As was said to me a day or two ago by the Senator from Washington [Mr. SQUIRE], and who called my attention to it, itappears to be the very gist of the whole thing. Has gold appreciated? If it has, and silver is still maintaining all over the whole its purchasing power, as I amendeavoring to show, then the question is, how shall we propose a remedy that shall not raise silver up, but bring gold down to its former position and keep it from continually appreciating? So I beg the indulgence of the Senate while I read a little further.

Van den Berg, a delegate of the Netherlands, made a speech in the conference. Although it is not just what I referred to before I had it in my mind but could not put my hand on it. He refers to Dr. Soetbeer's statement as to the amount of gold that is absorbed in industrial uses in the arts and trade, and says:

This result of the accurate investigations of Dr. Soetbeer has struck me all the more, as he was formerly one of those who was in no wise alarmed as to the scarcity of gold for monetary uses; and not to seem to exaggerate the importance of this I think I should recall the very words which the learned Dr. Soetbeer used to express his idea. This is what he wrote shortly before his death:

"One could not demonstrate by figures the incorrectness of the hypothesis that in recent years the industrial use of gold, together with the needs of Oriental countries and for private hoards, had materially arrested the increase of the monetary stock and had very probably absorbed the annual production of the metal; but proofs are equally lacking to support the contrary hypothesis."

trary hypothe

Mr. Van den Berg goes on to say:

Mr. Van den Berg goes on to say:

The sufficiency or the insufficiency of gold for the monetary uses of the world is, gentlemen, the real knot of the question before us. It is not unfamiliar that up till now the defenders of monometallism have always supported the idea that there was no lack of gold and that a more or less considerable appreciation of the yellow metal was entirely out of the question. The bimetallists alone were of the contrary opinion, but now one of the most fervent partisans of monometallism has joined their ranks and tells us that it is not silver which has fallen but gold which has risen. The partisan which I have in mind is the Statist of London, which is an authority in monetary and financial matters, and rightly so, because, unless I am mistaken it is written at the dictation, or at least at the inspiration, of the learned statistician, Robert Giffen. In the number of November 5 we read the following declaration apropos of the proposals submitted to the British Government in regard to the possible introduction of the gold standard in British India.

Now I read the quotation from the Statist:

We presume that the plan is based upon the mistaken notion that the value of gold is more stable than that of silver. We have seen that between 1973 and 1880 all gold prices fell ruinously. We have also seen that during the same period silver prices did not fail; in other words, while the smaller quantity of gold year after year exchanged for a larger quantity of all other commodities, silver included, the same quantity of silver, or nearly the same, exchanged for the same quantity of all other commodities, gold excluded. Does it not necessarily follow that it was the condition which determined the value of gold, which altered, not the condition which determined the value of silver; or, to put the matter into perhaps plainer language, does it not necessarily follow that the value of silver during the past twenty years has been far more stable than the value of gold?

And that is a gold monometallic authority equal to any in the world.

Mr. SQUIRE. What is the date? Mr. TELLER. November, 1892. This is what Mr. Van den Berg says:

Gentlemen, has the weakness of gold monometallism ever been placed in clearer light than in the lines which I have just cited, written by one of the most convinced monometallists, by a "Gold Fanatiker" as the Germans say? If the true that the price of sliver has remained stable, and that it is gold which has risen during the last twenty years, that is a condemnation pure and simple of all mometary systems based upon gold, for the relative stability of its value is one of the essential conditions of a good money, and a gradual appreciation of the standard used to measure all values and affect all exchanges can not fail to be disastrous to all mankind, as it benefits only those who own it and aggravates the position of the others, the workers; in a word, the immense majority of the population.

I have a large number of citations here from various authorities as to the appreciation of gold, and to the effect that silver has maintained steadily its purchasing power, except as to gold When measured by commodities, silver remained in its normal condition, still purchasing as much in its bar form to-day as it would in 1873, when it was demonetized. In 1873 an ounce of silver would not buy in this country a bushel of wheat by 3 cents—I am speaking now of the uncoined silver in this country. To-day an ounce of silver, as low as it is, will buy more than a bushel of wheat in ear market in the would on at least it will in this day an ounce of silver, as low as it is, will buy more than a bushel of wheat in any market in the world, or at least it will in this country, and it will come so near to it in the markets of Europe that it may be said to practically do that.

In 1873 an ounce of silver, treated simply as a commodity, would exchange for 6½ pounds of cotton. To-day the same silver can be exchanged for 10 pounds of cotton. That is true of all other products. Silver has not lost its purchasing power as compared with products. It has lost its purchasing power of gold; in other words, gold has increased in value 55 per cent. In 1873 a man who owed a thousand dollars could pay it with a little over 800 bushels of wheat. To-day he must take 1,500 bushels of wheat to pay the same amount: and with his thousand bushels of wheat to pay the same amount; and with his thousand bushels of wheat he could buy as much silver in 1873 as he can buy now.

As the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES] said the other day, when all things have changed except one the change is in the one and not in all; it is a change in the money that measures it,

I have here one or two authorities that possibly I had better read. The fall in the price of commodities and the rise in the price of money is one of a very serious character to the men who produce. It is especially serious to the men who are owing produce. It is especially serious to the men who are owing debts. It is especially serious to a country that owes large amounts of money in other countries and has to sell its products amounts of money in other countries and has to sell its products to pay its debts abroad. If the wheat that goes from this country to Europe could be sold at the old price of 1873 we would be very much nearer paying our debts than we are now. Where we sent one bushel of wheat then we must send nearly two to meet the same debt. Every year the price grows less and less. We must send more wheat every year than we sent the preceding. This money condition of the world has destroyed the doctrine of supply and demand to a great degree. With a great crop or a little crop or a great demand or a little demand the crop or a little crop or a great demand or a little demand the price is steadily downward.

Mr. President, what does the repeal of the act of 1890 mean?

All the authorities so far as I know that are worthy of attention declare that with this repeal there must come a further fall in silver. It was repeated by a number of gentlemen in the conference of 1892 that the repeal of this act would mean a fall in silver. The English papers have declared within the last ten days that with the repeal of the act there would be a further fall in silver. Nobody can deny it. All business men are anticipating it. The further fall in silver is simply an appreciation of gold. It is simply a fall in prices, a lower price for everything that we manufacture, a lower price for everything that we create, a lower price for the thousand million dollars' worth of products that we export.

It will not do for the advocates of repeal to tell me that this is but a temporary thing; that when they have disposed of this bill, when they have the Sherman act off the statute book, they are prepared to give us proper legislation on this subject. If that was the sentiment of the people who are demanding repeal, they would have consented to some adjustment of this question. They would have consented that the people who fear and predict disaster to come to the industries of this country by consented to the people who fear and predict disaster to come to the industries of this country by consented to the people who fear and predict disaster to come to the industries of this country by consented to the people who fear and predict disaster to come to the industries of this country by consented to the people who fear and predict disaster to come to the industries of this country by consented to the people who fear and predict disaster to come to the industries of this country by consented to the people who fear and predict disaster to come to the industries of this country by consented to the people who fear and predict disaster to come to the industries of this country by consented the people who fear and predict disaster to come to the industries of this country by consented the people who fear and predict disaster to come to the industries of this country by consented the people who fear and predict disaster to come to the industries of this country by consented the people who fear and predict disaster to come to the industries of this country by consented the people who fear and predict disaster to come to the industries of this country by consented the people who fear and predict disaster to come to the industries of the people who fear and predict disaster to come to the industries of the people who fear and predict disaster to come to the people who fear and predict disaster to come to the people who fear and predict disaster to come to the people who fear and predict disaster to come to the people who fear and predict disaster to come to the people who fear and people who fe traction to be brought about by repeal might have something it should be unconditional repeal or nothing.

There has never been an hour since the Senate met to consider there has never been a majority of this body who this question that there has not been a majority of this body who believed in their hearts (and they have so expressed it, if not openly on the floor in private conversation at least), that there ought to be an adjustment of this matter; that there should be some provision made not simply for the purchase of silver, not simply in the interest of the mine owners, but in the interest of preventing a contraction; that there should be some steps taken to secure to the people of the United States an increase of

There is not a man living who will dare stand before the American people and declare to-day that there is not a necessity that every month there should be put into our currency more money, equal in extent at least to the growth of population, equal in amount to the demands that are made by new business, increased commerce and trade. No country growing as ours can afford to take the position of standing still on its money, and Senators who are favoring repeal dare not face that question.

They tell us to wait until the repeal takes place and they will give us something that is liberal; that if they take away the siler legislation they will add to the money of the country all that the business of the country demands.

Mr. President, that is not to be done. There will be, in my sudgment, no effective legislation upon this subject in the next our years. There will be no effective legislation until the four years. American people are heard from-not the bankers, not the Wall street people, not the boards of trade, but the great American voting population; and I believe that they will be heard from in a way that may be eventually effectual; that it will be found in time that the people will rule, and that no man or two or three men can stand in the way of a proper adjustment of this question.

We were told the other day that there was to be a compromise.

We were told that the extremes were to meet, and those who demand a great deal on one side and on the other would yield something. If rumor is true a very large and respectable por-tion of the Senate had agreed to some adjustment of this difficulty. It is said in a way that justifies me in speaking of it that he who has no right to speak to us upon this subject declared that no compromise should take place; that it would be unconditional repeal or nothing.

Mr. President, the Senate has been in session for eleven weeks. The eyes of the whole American people have been upon the Senate. The demand has been made upon us from certain quarters for speedy action. We have deliberated and considered and dis-cussed. We on this side of the Chamber, I mean those who have favored the largest use of allver as money, have been ready at all times to test this question, not in the forum of physical endurance, but in that which is becoming and befitting American Senators, in the forum of debate. We have challenged our opponents to meet us on every question and they have met us principally with taunts and revilings. They have met us by the old stale and worn-out and broken-down arguments of monometallism. They have denied the existence of facts as patent and as apparent as that the sun shines in the heavens. Then they turn around and tell us to get rid of this bill and at some time in the future they will consider this financial question.

This question, touching every man's interest everywhere in this country, is to be postponed to a more convenient season. What time can be more appropriate than the present, when the country is suffering, when the people are in distress, when the mills are shut up, and the country is full of unemployed and idle men? We have an abundance of time; why should there be haste? Why should we be asked to proceed to-day any more than next week or the week after?

A great party has come into power in all the departments of the Government, and here we are, after ninety days, with no financial system offered, no financial system provided. It was said here by myself more than six weeks ago that I assumed that this party would have a financial policy and would enuciate it. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. Platt] indicated that he thought I was rather too sanguine. I think, possibly, I that he thought I was rather too sanguine. I think, possibly, I was; at least we have seen no indication of a financial policy, but we are told it is to come later. When?

We are told also that if the Sherman law is repealed there will come prosperity: that the mills which are closed will be opened; that the unemployed will have employment: where there is now want there will be plenty: and where there is now idleness there will be labor. I am neither a prophet nor the son of a prophet, but I say here that the signs of the times do not indicate such a result, and the great metropolitan press, which have been preaching to us day by day that all that was needed to make good times was to repeal the Sherman act, vesterday in their columns, when they declared that the end of this controversy had come, that unconditional repeal was assured, took the precaution to inform their readers that they must not expect too much from repeal, their readers that they must not expect too much from repeal, that it was not assured that prosperity would come with repeal.

Mr. President, this country is not to see prosperity immediately. The world is disjointed and out of shape on account of the monetary condition; and we shall have in this country distance and the property of the property of the state of the s the monetary condition, and we shar have in this country dis-tress, stagnation, and paralysis of business, and the same will be the case throughout the world; it will prevail abrond as well as here. They will have it in Europe; and they will have it in every country where the gold standard prevails; and they will have it nowhere else. They have not had it in India; they have not had it in China; they have not had it in Mexico; they have not had it in Japan; they have not had it in any country that has been using silver as the standard, because the discarded silver of the world has gone to those countries, and they have had an abundance of metallic money, while other people have been suffering on account of the scarcity of money. So there has been prosperity, I repeat, and greater stability of prices in every prosperity, I repeat, and greater stability of prices in every portion of the world where silver is used as the standard, than portion of the world where sliver it used as the standard, than in countries where gold is used.

Mr. HIGGINS. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, his statement is very interesting; but it reminds me that only this morning the newspapers published a telegram from Mexico indicating that times were as badly out of joint there as anywhere else. It is to be remarked that Mexico is a country having large else. It is to be remarked that Mexico is a country having large gold obligations to Europe. On the other hand, we have information that the prosperity in China and Japan was never greater; that it has not been seriously affected by the stoppage of the coinage of silver in India, which has made a difference of exchange between India and other parts of the Orient. The purpose of my interruption was to ask the Senator if he understood there were good times now in Mexico?

Mr. TELLER. I understand there are good times in Mexico. I understand that Mexico in the last five years has made more nunderstand that Mexico in the last live years has made more progress than during any twenty-five years of its history.

Mr. HIGGINS. I am speaking about this time.

Mr. TELLER. Yes. The number of factories which have been started in Mexico in the last few years is remarkable. There is prosperity in Mexico, except so far as the public debt is concerned, which is payable in gold; and the Government of Mexico, like the Government of India, is in distress on that account. The tayers are collected in silver in Mexico, and their The taxes are collected in silver in Mexico, and their debts are payable in gold. The great railroad of Mexico, and their debts are payable in gold. The great railroad of Mexico, whose bonds are owned principally in Europe, has been paying 50 per cent of its income to turn its silver into gold; and in that respect that great railroad has been embarrassed. The Government, owing ten to twelve millions of interest every year, has been compelled to add the difference between the silver collected and gold, that is, what silver will buy in gold, making their interest debt in Europe instead of $12,000,000 somewhere in the neighborhood of $18,000,000. That is the trouble which exists in Mexico. A distinguished Mexican said to me within the last four weeks that Mexico was prosperous. He is a man who ought to know the condition of Mexico if any man does. When I asked him, "Will you close your mints if silver goes lower?" he replied, "We shall not close our mints if silver goes to 50 cents an ounce." He said, "Mexico was never prospering as now; but what we sell we sell for silver, and what we buy we buy for gold; and the prices are so high that our people are ceasing to buy foreign goods and are themselves manufacturing.

Now, let us go to Japan and China. China has been substantially stable in all her prices for twenty years. I know that when the disturbance came in the fall of silver, and when it was re-ported that the Mexican nation would cease to coin silver dollars and close its mints, the merchants of Hongkong, became frightened, held a meeting to determine how they could manage to do business there, because they had been in the habit of using Mexican silver dollars as their currency. That is the only disturbancel can learn of in China. When they found that the Mexican Government did not intend to close its mints, but would continue to coin silver, they were content. This is the latest advice I have from China and it is quite recent.

There is no question of the appreciation of gold; there is no question that that appreciation of gold is bearing heavily upon all the productive energies of this country and of the world. all the productive energies of this country and of the world. There is no question that the only men who are being benefited by it, as the Senator from Nevada [Mr. Jones] has repeatedly said, and as Mr. Allard has said, are the annuitants, those who have fixed incomes, and the people who hold the credits of the world, who hold consols and bonds which are payable in gold. They are benefited because the amount to be paid remains the same, while the purchasing power of every dollar is doubled, and the ability of every man to pay is decreased by the appreciation of gold just in proportion as it appreciates. If the appreciation is 45 per cent, then he is 45 per cent worse off than he calculated when he made his contract; if it is 55 per cent he is per cent worse off than when he made his contract.

Mr. President, no year of jubilee comes to the debtor class and no year of jubilee will come to them, until we rehabilitate silver and bring gold down to where it ought to be.

History shows that the greatest benefit the world has received was when the burden of debt was removed from the people, and that the greatest calamity which can befall any people in the world is to have the burden of debt increased.

I presented here recently statistical information to show that the debts of this country had been increased to such an extent that it seems to me it will be impossible for the makers of these debts ever to pay. The only government in the world we know of which released all debtors was that which came directly from the Divine command, and which provided that every fifty years the debtorshould go free. It was a wise provision of law; it was an economic principle, that it would be well should be applied by all nations, but no year of jubilee is proposed here; pay or get out is the rule now.

I stated on a former occasion that the English system of finance adopted in 1816 and completed in 1819 by the so-called Peel act, changed the condition of the landowners of Great Britain, reducing their numbers to one-fourth, changing entirely the landed system of the country, under which the great productive farming power of the country, the independent farm-owner disappeared. That will be the condition in this country if the present policy is continued. The American farmer who owns his farm will in a generation be a thing of the past.

Mr. President, it is important for us to consider whether we shall destroy the best element of American manhood by our system of finance.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to ask the Senstor if he means to be understood as saying that the number of freeholders or landholders in Great Britain has been decreased to about one-fourth of the original number?

Mr. TELLER. It is even worse than that.

Mr. HIGGINS. To one-fourth or by one-fourth?

Mr. TELLER. To one-fourth. In a few years, in a generation, of the men who owned their farms and tilled them under that system three-fourths of them disappeared; and that is what is laid out for us.

It will not do for anybody to tell me that this proposed legislation is in the interest of an honest dollar. It has to be done in the interest of a dishonest dollar, or robbery and thievery and fraud upon the productive energies of the American people.

Mr. HIGGINS. I should like to ask the Senator whether it is his serious contention that the reduction and almost extirpation of the number of freehold farmers who till their own land in Great Britain was occasioned by such a cause as he has stated? Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator tell me what was the cause? Mr. HIGGINS. I believe that Alison, the historian, attributed it to free trade, but certainly the culmin tion occurred several decades ago.

Mr. TELLER. Alison did not attribute it to free trade. That Mr. TELLER. Alson did not attribute it to free trade. That class of farmers disappeared practically before free trade was adopted. Free trade was not adopted in Engiand until after the great depression which came by the Peel act, described so graphically by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. Jones] the other day, and described hundreds of times by publicists and writers upon this question, which could hardly have escaped the attention of the Senator

Mr. HIGGINS. Certainly the reduction of the number of freeholders in Great Britain who till their own farms could not have been caused by the failure of the world to use silver.

Mr. TELLER. Oh, Mr. President, it is not that. The world used silver, but England went to the gold standard, and attempted to do her business upon a limited amount of money. That is what she did, and that is what brought disaster. But does the Senator deny that there was for twenty years the greatest distress in Great Britain which ever existed in any country? If he will take Doubleday's history of the transactions of that period, he will find that men went to Parliament with petitions declaring that they had paid out large sums, amounting in some instances to almost two or three hundred thousand dollars for estates, and then had to mortgage them for half the money, estates, and then had to mortgage them for half the money, which they could not pay, and so had lost their estates, and asked Parliament to grant them relief. I think the Senator from Nevada recently in his first speech alluded to that. The whole matter can be found in Doubleday's Financial History of England, published in 1847.

Mr. HIGGINS. If the Senator will permit me, it is a subject upon which I have not read recently, but I well remember reading one of the last speeches of Mr. John Bright, in which he attributed that distress to the duty upon corn and that it placed the price of grain at a very unreasonable height in Great Britain, which made great profits to the landowner, so that he was ain, which made great profits to the landowner, so that he was able, and it was to his advantage, to buy out tenant farmers, and

Mr. TELLER. It was not the landowner who bought out the tenant farmer. John Bright could never have made that statement. It was the banker, and the merchant, and the broker who bought the land; it was not the men who tilled the land who bought, but it was the men who had capital and lived in cities and accumulated great amounts of land, which they leased out. Before that time the rule all over Great Britain was that the men who owned 200, 400, or 500 acres of land belonged to what they called in that country the yeomanry. They were the bone and the sinew of the land, and it was from that class that there came the soldiers, and the sailors, and the defenders of the English flag and the illustrators of the glory of the English race.

Mr. HIGGINS. It is my recollection that previous to the adop tion of the law repealing the corn laws the change of property in Great Britain was the aggrandizement of the estates of its nobles and its gentry, and it was owing to the great prosperity to trade which sprang up in England subsequent to the repeal of the corn laws, and consequently the advantage of England in the markets of the world which enabled the trades people to become the property of estates. Cantally that has been the come the purchasers of estates. Certainly that has been the case in Ireland in later days.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from Delaware will have ample time to explain his position. I say that he is incorrect. The Peel act was passed in 1819. That was the culmination of the act of 1816. In 1822, so bad had the condition of Great Britain become under the Sir Robert Peel act that they were compelled to suspend the operation of the act for some years, and a portion of the distress came during the following ten years, and afterwards, but it had culminated before the repeal of the corn laws in 1842. The Senator first said it was free trade, and now he says it was the corn laws.

Mr. HIGGINS. I stated that Alison, the historian, said it was free trade. I informed the Senator, and he will so find in an essay published in Blackwood's Magazine in 1849. I did not give it as my view, but I simply referred to that authority.

Mr. TELLER. I do not remember what Alison said, but the history of the world, an examination of its position, and the petitions which went up to Parliament, explain the condition of the country at the time when it was declared that the landowners had been robbed and destroyed by the capitalists of the country. That ought to convince the Senator, and I think it will. I am not asserting it on my own statement alone, but it has been asserted again and again that England's going to a gold standard brought about a condition which nobody can deny existed.

It has been depicted and described by historian after historian. Some of them have said that it did not result, perhaps, altogether from the change in her financial system, but, it my judgment, it did result from that cause, and it brought about the condition I have mentioned; so that the man who owned from 200 to 400 acres of land and tilled it with his boys, and worked it with his own hands, and whose wife and daughters worked in the same way-that class has disappeared rapidly from Great Britain, and they are now the exception, while they were the rule before. Nobody can deny that.

That is, I repeat, what will be done in this country. You will place such burdens upon the American farmer that he will the utterly unable to remove the mortgage upon his property. This will be done by degrees; not in a year, not in ten years; but in a generation you will see American farmers as independent landowners disappear in this country. I do not suppose legislation here is intended for a month, or six months, or a suppose the statement of the suppose that the suppose is to what may have not a suppose the suppose that the suppose the suppose that the suppose that the suppose the suppose that the suppose the suppose that the suppose the suppose that the su year. I am not so much concerned as to what may happen tomorrow, but I am concerned as to the logical sequence of the principles which are here to be adopted, or to flow from them in one year or ten years or twenty years or thirty years; and he is one year or ten years or twenty years or thirty years; and he is a very careless and a very ignorant legislator who legislates only for to-day and who sees no evil ahead.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to ask the Senator if he has made any investigation of this question recently, and whether the relative proportion of landowners to our own agricultural population has increased or decreased within the last few years?

Mr. TELLER. I suppose that the farming population has probably increased. I think the landowners, owing to the land in the new States, have been on the increase. Of course we have in the new States, have been on the increase. Of course we have had a large amount of virgin soil to divide amongst our people; we had the great plains of the West to be settled, and we have given a farm to every man who would go upon it. To-day that is practically over; as the Senator from Delaware rightfully said, we have reached the point now where there will be comparatively few farms made hereafter from unimproved lands paratively lew larms made incessiver from unimproved analysis and the extreme West, where irrigation prevails, but very little in any other section of the country.

But there is one thing which nobody denies, that farm mortgages have increased at a rapid rate. If Senators will take up the census reports and take one State after another they will find the heading, "Farm mortgages have progressively increased." If the mortgages amounted to so much ten years ago, you will know they amount to more this year

I have here a statement, which I presented to the Senate on the 21st of August and had printed, and I then challenged any body to deny the correctness of it, because I took some little pains to satisfy myself that it was correct. It is the statement made by Mr. Frederick C. Waite relative to the cause of the financial and industrial depression, which has been mist the financial and industrial depression, which has been printed as a Senate document. I did not intend to refer to it, but as it bears upon this question I think it proper that I should quote from it. Mr. Waite says:

The most astonishing increase of all, however, is in the real estate mortgage indebtedness, as disclosed by the investigations of the Eleventh Census. Let us remember that this is largely the debt of the hardest working and the poorest paid of all our American citizens, namely, the farmers and the laborers who are trying to obtain a home of their own by honest toil.
In the twenty-one States for which the mortgage indebtedness has been tabulated the aggregate amount in force at the close of 1899 was four thousand five hundred and forty-seven millions with the great States of Ohio, Texas, and California, and whole groups of lesser States yet to be heard from. The grand aggregate will be no less than six thousand three hundred millions.
The aggregate in 1890 was only about two thousand five hundred millions.

So the farm indebtedness, if this statement be correct, has more than doubled in ten years.

Last year, after turning the scale at eight thousand millions, the mortgage indebtedness continued its upward flight, not being contented with an increase of 220 per cent, or nearly four times the increase in the true value of real estate.

In a word, the total net private indebtedness of the American people equaled, in 1880, but 86,750,00,000. Last September it amounted to nineteen thousand seven hundred millions, an increase of thirteen thousand millions in the short period of twelve years.

If anybody can contemplate with equalimity the condition of the American people with that amount of indebtedness to pay, with falling prices, with languishing industries, he must be different from most men.

When you realize that the holders of this $19,700,000,000, or at when you realize that the holders of this $19,700,000,000,000, or at least a portion of it, held in the great cities and the great money centers, are the agencies which have been assalling the Senate for ninety days to hasten to give them an extra opportunity to take an additional sum out of their debtors, you need not wontake an additional sum out of their debtors, you need not wontake an additional sum out of their debtors, you need not wontake an additional sum out of their debtors, you need not wontake an afford to bring upon the Senate agencies never before heaveful to be a present to be a pres brought to bear upon it.

I have said before, and I repeat now, their stake is too great to hope or expect that they will relax their efforts. They mean to put this country, if possible, upon a low plane of prices, because when they do that they increase the purchasing power of every dollar they hold, and then we shall be told that all of this is done that we may have an honest dollar, a dollar of the greatest purchasing power. Mr. President, the dollar which has appreciated 55 per cent in twenty years is not an honest dollar. What we want is a dollar which maintains the stability and uniformity of prices in this country, so that a man who enters into an engagement to-day to manufacture or to do any kind of business may know something about what he will getfor his product

I have a large number of quotations from various writers on this subject, which I thought I should use in the course of my remarks, but I do not think I shall take the time to-day to do it. I have here, however, an article written by Mr. J. Barr Robertson which was published in the February number of the Journal of the Society of Arts, in the city of London, entitled "The cur-rency problem." I had intended to quote at considerable length from this article, as it contains some very excellent suggestions, is very instructive, and is written in a most candid manner; but, instead of using it in my remarks, I ask permission of the Senate to have it published as a document, because I think it will furnish to Senators, no matter what their views may be on the subject, information which they will be glad to get.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Colorado? The Chair hears none, and the article referred to will be printed as a document.

Mr. TELLER. I now yield to the Senator from Washington [Mr. SQUIRE]. SCHOOLS OF MINES.

Mr. DUBOIS. I ask the Senator from Washington to yield to me in order that I may call up Senate bill 1040, which I think will not lead to any debate.

Mr. SQUIRE. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. DÜBOIS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1040) to aid the States of California, Oregon, Washington, Montana, Idaho, Nevada, Wyoming, Colorado, and South Dakota to support schools of mines.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objects the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. DUBOIS. I ask that the bill be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. TELLER. I notice that the bill provides for the payment of 25 per cent to the States named in the bill of the amount paid to the United States for mineral lands within those States. A similar bill has been passed three or four times and it has always been passed with a provision for 50 per cent. I shall move to strike out "25" and insert "50." Mr. DUBOIS. That will be entirely agreeable to me.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. Is there

Mr. McPHERSON. I think the bill had better go over until to-morrow, so that we may have an opportunity to examine it.
Mr. DUBOIS. I will state to the Senator that the bill has been reported from the Committee on Public Lands.
Mr. WASHBURN. When the bill shall be under consideration, I shall move an amendment to insert "Minnesota" in the list of States named.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection has been made to the present consideration of the bill, and it will go over.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. Towles, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. Res 66) that the acknowledgments of the Government and the peo-ple of the United States be tendered to various foreign governments of the world in commemoration of the discovery of America by Christopher Columbus.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the

Senate:

A bill (H. R. 693) for the relief of the heirs of Martha A. Dealy, deceased; and

A bill (H. R. 913) for the relief of Louis C. Williams.
The message further announced that the House had passed concurrent resolutions regulating the engrossment and enrollment of bills and joint resolutions

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE MUTCHLER.

The message also announced that the House had passed relutions commemorative of the life and services of the Hon. William Mutchler, late a Representative from the State of Pennsyl-

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, I request that the resolutions just received from the House of Representatives, relative to the death of my late colleague, Mr. Mutchier, lie on the table for the present. At the proper time I shall ask the Senate, by appropriate action, to pay fitting tribute to the virtues of the deceased.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolutions will lie on the table.

INVESTIGATION OF FORD'S THEATER DISASTER.

Mr. WHITE of Louisiana, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom were referred the resolutions submitted by Mr. HARRIS, October 7, 1893, reported them adversely, and submitted a report thereon. The resolutions were read, as follows:

The resolutions were read, as follows:

Resolved, That a select committee of five Senators be appointed by the Chair to investigate the Ford Theater disaster and report to the Senate whether in equity and justice the Government should compensate the sufferers of that disaster for the injuries sustained by them, and if it shall be decided that they should be compensated, then the committee will investigate each individual case and report the amount of compensation that should be allowed in each case. Be it further

Resolved, That the committee may employ a clerk who is a stenographer and who shall do the stenographic work of the committee as clerk, and that the committee shall have power to send for persons and papers, and the chairman of the committee, or of any subcommittee, may administer caths. Be it further

Resolved, That the expenses of said investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Resolved further, That said committee may act jointly with a similar committee, and that the committee may report by bill or otherwise.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolutions will lie on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolutions will lie on the table.

Mr. GORMAN. I suggest, as the resolutions are reported adversely, that they be postponed indefinitely.

Mr. WHITE of Louisiana. I hope the Senator will not make that motion.

Mr. GORMAN. I withdraw it.

Mr. WHITE of Louisiana. I simply ask that the resolutions lie on the table

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered, in the absence of objection.

Mr. HARRIS subsequently said: I desire to ask what disposition was made of the resolutions introduced by myself some days ago and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses in regard to the Ford Theater sufferers.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator from Tennessee that the resolutions were reported adversely by the committee and laid on the table.

Mr. HARRIS. Let them lie on the table, and I shall ask the Senate, possibly to-morrow, to consider them.

ACTING ASSISTANT DOORKEEPER.

Mr. WHITE of Louisiana, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the following resolution introduced by Mr. Hale, August 30, 1893, reported adversely thereon, and the resolution was ordered to lie on the table;

Hesolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ an additional acting assistant doorkeeper at an annual salary of $2,502, to be paid from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the

ASSISTANT ENROLLING AND ENGROSSING CLERK

Mr. WHITE of Louisiana, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the following resolution submitted by Mr. Dolph, August 3, 1893, reported adversely thereon, and the resolution was ordered to lie on the table:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate is authorized and directed to appoint an additional clerk, to be designated assistant enrolling and engrossing clerk, at an annual salary of $2.400 per annum, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate for the remainder of the fiscal year.

THOMAS WILLIAMS.

Mr. WHITE of Louisiana, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the following resolution submitted by Mr. WOLCOTT, September 12, 1893, submitted an adverse report thereon, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to:

Whereas Thomas Williams, in the proper discharge of his duties as laborer in the folding room of the Senate, on the 8th day of August, 1892, was seriously injured in the freight elevator, having the heel of his right foot badly injured and the fiesh entirely scraped away, rendering a permanent injury, and from the results of which he was confined to his bed for five months after the accident and is still suffering therefrom:

*Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the said Thomas Williams out of the contingent fund of the Senate the sum of $000, to enable him to pay for medical and other expenses incurred and which may hereafter be incurred on account of said injuries.

ASSISTANT CUSTODIANS AND JANITORS.

Mr. GORMAN. I submit at this time a resolution asking for information of importance to the Committee on Appropriations, which I desire to have read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate as early-as practicable the number, names, title of office or employment, rate of compensation, and date of appointment of all persons now employed at each public building under control of the Treasury Department and paid out of the appropriation for "pay of assistant custodians and janitors, fiscal year 1894."

Mr. GORMAN. I only desire to state to the Senate that there appears to be a large deficiency in the appropriation made for this purpose, and an additional appropriation is asked for. The information requested by the resolution is desired by the Com-mittee on Appropriations before it acts on the matter. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

resolution.

Mr. CALL. I understood that the report made by the Senator from Missouri[Mr. COCKRELL] in reference to the several Executive Departments of the Government contained the information asked for by the resolution of the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. GORMAN. No, it does not contain the information which the committee desire. This resolution is to cover a specific case in reference to a deficiency of $150,000.

Mr. CALL. I have no objection to the resolution, but I indownstood that the information sought had been previously.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 693) for the relief of the heirs of Martha A. Dealy, deceased, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The bill (H. R. 913) for the relief of Louis C. Williams, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Quadro-Centennial (Select).

ENGROSSMENT AND ENROLLMENT OF BILLS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolutions of the House of Representatives; which Were read:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That, beginning with the first day of the regular session of the Fifty-third Congress, to wit, the first Monday in December, 1893, in lieu of being engrossed, every bill and joint resolution in each House of Congress at the stage of the consideration at which a bill or joint resolution is at present engrossed, shall be printed, and such printed copy shall take the place of what is now known as, and shall be called, the engrossed bill, or resolution, as the case may be; and it shall be dealt with in the same manner as engrossed bills and joint resolutions are dealt with at present, and shall be sent in printed form, after passing, to the other House, and in that form shall be dealt with by that House, and its officers in the same manner in which engrossed bills and joint resolutions are now dealt with.

Resolved, That when such bill or joint resolution shall have passed both Houses it shall be printed on parchment, which print shall be in lieu of what is now known as, and shall be called, the enrolled bill, or joint resolution, as the case may be, and shall be dealt with in the same manner in which enrolled bills and joint resolutions are now dealt with.

Resolved, That the Joint Committee on Printing is hereby charged with the duty of having the foregoing resolutions properly executed, and is empowered to take such steps as may be necessary to carry them into effect, and provide for the speedy execution of the printing herein contemplated.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire, in connection with these resolu-

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire, in connection with these resolutions, to submit a report from the Joint Commission to Inquire into the Status of the Laws Organizing the Executive Departments, etc., recommending the resolutions. I ask that the report and the resolutions be printed, and for the present lie on the table, until I can call them up.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

OCEAN DERELICTS.

Mr. FRYE. I ask unanimous consent to make a report from the Committee on Commerce at this time. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to report, without amendment, the joint resolution (H. Res. 55) for the reporting, marking, and removal of derelicts; and I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It proposes to appropriate $5,000 to enable the President of the United States to make with the several governments interested in the navigation of the North Atlantic Ocean an international agreement providing for the reporting, marking, and removal of dangerous wrecks, derelicts, and other menaces to navigation in the North Atlantic Ocean outside the coast waters of the respective countries bordering thereon.

Mr. FRYE. I merely desire to state that the hydrographic Mr. FRYE. I increase desired to the state of a line in the Atlantic Ocean drawn from the Bermudas to Cape Race and Newfoundland there were 983 of those wreeks. The pilot chart of the same month showed 45 wrecks, 25 of which were directly in the tracks of our transatlantic steamers. The life of these wrecks is on the average about thirty days.

There have been added to the number I have given, every month for about five years, at least 16, and I have no doubt today that our sailors are much more terrified at the presence of these derelicts than they are at storms or anything of that kind.

The Maritime Congress, which met here four years ago, recommended very earnestly that the different countries should unite and have such of these derelicts marked as could be marked, and that as fast as possible the balance should be destroyed. This action has been taken now after the lapse of four years, and I trust that the Senate may concur with the other House and

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NEW ENGLAND COAST STEAM REVENUE CUTTER.

Mr. FRYE. I am also instructed by the Committee on Commerce to report favorably, and without amendment, the bill (H. R. 3421) providing for the construction of a steam revenue cutter for the New England coast.

I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill, for the reason that the proposed revenue cutter is to take the place of the Gallatin, which was destroyed in a severe storm about a year ago. The Secretary of the Treasury says that it is absolutely necessary that one shall be immediately built, and it is important that the building should commence at as early a day as possible.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to have constructed a steam revenue cutter of the first class for service on the New England coast, at a cost not exceeding $175,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PURCHASE OF SILVER BULLION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 1) to repeal a part of an act, approved July 14, 1890, entitled "An act directing the purchase of silver bul-

Mr. SQUIRE. Mr. President, I desire to discuss the bill which is under consideration by the Senate; but I wish to do so more particularly with reference to the amendment offered by myself, which I ask may be read.

That hereafter any owner of silver bullion, the product of mines or refineries located in the United States, may deposit the same at any mint of the United States, to be formed into standard dollars of the present weight and fineness, for his benefit, as hereinafter stated; but it shall be lawful to refuse any deposit of lees value than $100, or any bullion so base as to be unsuitable for the operation of the mint: Provided, however. That there shall only be delivered or paid to the person depositing said silver bullion such number of standard silver dollars as shall equal the commercial value of said silver bullion on the day of deposit as ascertained and determined by the Secretary of the Treasury; the difference, if any, between the mint or coin value of said standard silver dollars and the commercial value of the silver bullion thus deposited shall be retained by the Government as seignlorage, and the gain or seignlorage arising from such coinage shall be accounted for and paid into the Treasury: Provided, That the deposits of silver bullion for coinage into silver dollars under the provisions of this act shall not exceed the sum of $2,000,000 per month. The amount of such seignlorage or gain shall be retained in the Treasury as a reserve fund in silver dollars, or such other form of equivalent lawful money as the Secretary of the Treasury may from time to time direct, for the purpose of maintaining the parity of value of every silver dollar, issued under the provisions of this act, with the gold dollar issued by the United States; Provided Further, That when the number of standard silver dollars coined under the provision shall reach the sum of $100,000,000 then all further coinage of silver dollars shall cease.

Mr. SQUIRE. Mr. President, my original intention in offering the amendment proposed by myself was to embrace in it that which would be a reasonable solution of the great question now before us, so as to secure an early and decisive vote, and thereby perore us, so as to secure an early and decisive vote, and thereby in a reasonable way quiet the agitation throughout the country in regard to the national finances. I have endeavored to find that "middle path," which is the path of safety. Now, the object is the same, but the conditions are different. We are assured that a vote will be permitted by the minority upon the main question and the amendments thereto. Several amendments have been proposed, but none of them appear to me to reach the heart of the difficulty, or to satisfy the just expectations of those who are not extremists in either direction, unless this may be accomplished in the plan proposed in my amendment.

plished in the plan proposed in my amendment.

Originally I was for repeal, and am so now, and when the vote shall be taken on the main question, I shall be found standing with those who are in favor of repeal. Within a week from the time that we convened here in extra session it would have been proper in my judgment to have authorized the President of the Injud States to suggest the operation of the so-called Sherman United States to suspend the operation of the so-called Sherman act, especially with reference to the clause directing the purchase of silver by the United States Government

Mr. President, I would have acted in this matter as I would had there been a conflagration raging, taking a hand in carrying a bucket. I would stand by the President of the United States as I would have done had there been a foreign invasion or a great civil insurrection, authorizing him to call out men for the purpose of protecting the interests of our country.

As to the Sherman act all sensible men had long ago arrived at the conclusion that the experiment in that direction had proceeded far enough to demonstrate its failure, in view of the distrust that was being created in reference to the ability of the United States Government to maintain its credit on the gold basis, which is now the policy of the Government.

Instead of proceeding promptly to repeal the purchasing clause of the Sherman act and then devoting ourselves to new measures in aid of a sound and sufficient currency, we have gone into discussion of the whole subject during the past three months, and the American people, our constituents, have also been studying the subject, so that I feel that we are now prepared to enact some positive legislation instead of contenting ourselves with simple repeal. It has been openly stated on the floor of the Senate by the chairman of the Committee on Finance that as soon as the present question of repeal shall be settled he proposes to introduce new legislation on the silver question and other collateral currency questions, which will open up other wide fields of de-

The tendency of the proposed future discussion will naturally be such as to still further agitate the public mind on this general question; and therefore it seems to me proper to ask the Senate at the present time to act on certain main propositions so as to settle this business for the present in a manner to allay all irritation and to be just to all interests. It has been said in story that Nero, the Emperor of Rome, amused himself by playing the violin while Rome was burning. Is there any reasonable excuse for us to be fiddling further over this subject? Can we not reach some reasonable, comprehensive, and just conclusion on the leading questions involved without further delay, and thus give tone and vigor to the nation and assist to restore the business interests of the country to their normal status?

of the country to their normal status?

There are four phases to my amendment: One is the repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman act; but the léading feature of the proposed amendment is the recognition of silver under conditions that I am led to believe will be satisfactory at the present time to many advocates of the free coinage of silver.

I may say that it has been my endeavor to consult with those Senators representing the great silver-producing States, and to ascertain, if I might, from them, that which they could afford to accept; and I have been informed by some of them—not by all—that they would be willing to accept the provision for silver which is embodied in the terms of my proposed amendment.

which is embodied in the terms of my proposed amendment.

Not that this is all they desire, but that it comprehends such a continuation of the use of that metal as money as to save it from utter repudiation, and such further use of it as a money metal as this great Government can afford to undertake at the present time, without impairing the credit of the Government, and without shocking the sensibilities of those who are fearful of an early approach to a silver basis under the present existing conditions. In a word, I propose that which might be termed the "free coinage of silver," limited to $2,000,000 per month, the aggregate of the money coined not to exceed $100,000,000.

I propose that any holder of silver bullion, the product of American mines or refineries, may deposit his bullion with the

I propose that any holder of silver bullion, the product of American mines or refineries, may deposit his bullion with the Government to be coined into silver dollars of the present weight and fineness; and that he shall receive therefor in coined silver dollars the market value of the bullion on the day of deposit, such market value to be ascertained and determined by the Secretary of the Treasury. I propose that all the money thus coined above the market value of the silver bullion deposited on the day of deposit, shall be covered into the Treasury as a reserve fund, sacred to the maintenance of a parity of value between the silver dollars thus coined and the United States gold dollar.

I further propose that the seigniorage or surplusage thus coined above the value of such bullion may be transferred at the pleasure of the Secretary of the Treasury into any other form of equivalent lawful money. Thus it can be transferred into subsidiary coin or into gold coin or into any other kind of lawful money. For an example, if a holder of sufficient bullion to coin one hundred standard dollars shall deposit the same and receive sixty of these coined dollars as the equivalent in value of his bullion, as would approximately be the case in the present state of the silver market, there would remain, according to the proposed amendment, forty coined silver dollars in the reserve fund of the Treasury. This $40 may be paid out in place of gold, and then in such case the Government would have in its coffers $40 in gold to maintain the parity of one hundred silver dollars thus issued.

It will readily be noticed that this reserve fund would relatively far exceed the reserve fund now held or proposed to be held for the redemption of $346,000,000 of greenbacks, which at its highest figure, $100,000,000, at no time equalled one-third of the nominal value of the greenbacks. Besides this, the holder of every silver dollar would feel assured that he held "an honest dollar" in every sense of the word. It is the belief of some our friends in the Senate that under a measure of this kind the price of silver would appreciate; at any rate, that it would not decline. Certainly the declension of value of silver bullion under such conditions is not likely to occur, although there may be fluctuations in the value of silver.

If the price of silver bullion should remain about the same as now, every holder of a silver dollar would know that he held 60 cents' worth of silver bullion in his own pocket, and that the other 40 cents would be in the possession of the Government for his benefit in maintaining the parity of the silver dollar with the gold dollar of the United States. He would have the guaranty of the Government; and the Government would have possession of the money with which to fulfill its guaranty. The security of the silver dollar issued under such conditions would be such as to make it good in any part of the world. What better security could there be for any money issued by any government?

The question may be asked are we sure that the Government will possess the gold to fulfill this guaranty; but the answer is that if the Government maintains its credit and does actually maintain the parity of the dollar in commerce the Treasury will receive its fair share of gold under the natural conditions of trade.

If the seignorage "reserve" should remain in silver dollars, then the number of silver dollars issued would be much less than $2,000,000. In fact, at the present price of bullion there would be less than $1,200,000 issued per month.

But if the Secretary should not care to exchange the surplus or seignlorage for gold still there would remain in the parity fund a sufficient amount of money in some other form to maintain this guaranty.

The great difficulty that we have encountered in the late crisis has been the apprehension at home and abroad that there would be an indefinite and interminable expansion of the use of silver, or of its paper representative, as money under the operations of the Sherman act. And the whole doctrine of the purchase and storing of silver bullion by the Government in such masses has become revolting to us. Nobody doubts that this great Government and the business operations of its people could readily absorb one or even two or three hundred additional millions of silver money. We point to France and say that she has six hundred and fifty to seven hundred millions of silver and still maintains the gold standard; but the doubt has existed as to the Sherman law because of the wide, limitless sea of silver which might know no shore; and it is because of this uncertainty as to the quantity of silver money to be issued as money of final redemption by the United States that the minds of investors have become alarmed.

It is this and only this that caused the withholding of funds; and this is the evil that we mainly ought to seek to correct. I find much to commend in the theory of the distinguished Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES], if I understand it correctly, in reference to the doctrine of distinct and definite units and the quantity of units as a measure of values; and this thought of mine is not inconsistent with his; but I would feel our way more slowly and definitely in regard to the absorption of large additional amounts of silver as money of final redemption. The statement has been attributed to him that "What we want is not confidence but more money."

I do not exactly agree with him. I would venture to state the proposition in this way, that what we lack in confidence we need in money. Thus it is that in times of panic and distrust more actual money is needed than under normal conditions of trade; and there ought to be some way of meeting this demand, some greater flexibility as to the volume of money in the times of stringency. But it seems to me folly to suppose that by the addition of any reasonable or practicable amount of money in time of panic we shall be able to entirely overcome all the results of a loss of confidence. If we should increase the volume of the money fourfold we would not be able to do this; and the reason is very well stated in the very excellent report of Mr. Hepburn, late Comptroller of the Treasury, dated February 5, 1892, as follows:

My object in this report has been to furnish reliable data from which the public could see and realize how small a percentage of business transactions are represented by actual money, and how impossible it is to furnish a volume of currency sufficient to meet the wants of the people at all times—that is, in times of general distrust, or quasi panic. Over 90 per cent of all business transactions are done by means of credit. When the public lose confidence and the credit is impaired and refused, over 90 per cent of all business transactions are directly affected. It is easy to realize how impossible it is for the remaining 10 per cent of money to carry on the business of the country without monetary stringency and financial distress. The refusal to extend or continue credit, the demand for payment in money, leaves the actual money or currency of the country, be it $24 per capita or $50 per capita, utterly powerless to supply business needs.

This was written about a year and a half before the late panic, and of course without anticipation of it. But it is to the point now. Therefore it is plain that the main object of the present legislation should be the restoration of confidence. In no other way can we evoke the money that has been hoarded. The first thing to be secured is the assurance that the parities of value will be maintained so that every dollar will be equal in value to every other dollar, not only now, but for the future, so that investors will have confidence in the business operations of our people. This can not be accomplished by declarations in the statutes without some practical means for the support of these declarations.

This brings me to another and the most important section of the amendment, namely, that authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue, sell, and dispose of at not less than par in coin bonds of the United States bearing interest not to exceed 4 per cent per annum, payable semiannually and redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after five years from their date, with like qualities, privileges, and exemptions provided for the bonds at present issued and authorized, to the extent of $200,000,000, and to use the proceeds thereof for the purpose of maintaining the redemption of the United States notes according to the provisions of the act approved January 14, 1875, and for the further purpose of maintaining all the money of the United States at a par with the gold dollar.

I will state here that I am not marticular about any specific

I will state here that I am not particular about any specific rate of interest. The reason I inserted 4 per cent in the amendment was that I wished to make the rate ample, so as to compete with the rate of the Bank of England, which, I understand, is sometimes as high as 4 per cent; but I should be quite willing to have the rate fixed at 3 per cent or less if it be preferred.

While it is reasonably certain that the proposed coinage of

While it is reasonably certain that the proposed coinage of 100,000,000 silver dollars, running through four years, will be amply secured by the parity fund proposed to be provided in the manner stated, still I deem it necessary to strengthen the whole grand fabric of our circulation, and to fortify the gold reserve, as was done for specie resumption in 1878, and to increase our gold reserve in order to provide for the prompt redemption of all our currency in gold, and to maintain the parity between all our moneys. The surest way to establish confidence in our intentions and ability to maintain a gold basis, and to keep all our money at par with gold, would be to provide the necessary means of accomplishing this, which this amendment seeks to do.

Instead of being dependent on a reserve of about $81,000,000 or less to support six hundred or seven hundred millions of "credit money" and a lot of declarations in different statutes, it is proposed to permit the Secretary of the Treasury, at his discretion, to buy gold with the credit of our country and use this gold for the purpose of maintaining and redeeming all of our money at par. That the legal right exists at present to sell bonds under the provisions of the specie resumption act of January 14, 1875, to secure the gold necessary to maintain specie payments, I have no doubt; but this provision removes the doubt, if it exists, beyond all question, and provides for a bond bearing a lower rate of interest them at present authorized.

That serious trouble exists, that the two metals, gold and silver, will have unequal value in our currency system unless something be done to strengthen our gold reserve, is apparent to everyone. The only method available to prevent such a catastrophe, is to use the credit of our Government and to secure the gold necessary to insure the maintenance of the parity declared by the act of July 14, 1890, to be the established policy of our Government and to keep all our money redeemable in gold on demand. This provision, as I understand, has already received a favorable report from the Committee on Finance of the Senate.

The placing of bonds to a reasonable extent, such as the necessities of the case would warrant, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, and strengthening our gold reserves, would in my judgment do more to restore confidence, both at home and abroad, in our intention to maintain the gold standard than any other measure that could possibly be enacted, not excepting the absolutestoppage of the purchase of silver and coinage. It would restore confidence, not only by securing the means to readily maintain gold payments, but as a substantial declaration to the world that the matchless credit of this great nation would be used for that purpose whenever and to whatever extent necessary.

It is justified not only by the exigencies of the situation, but especially by the distressed condition of public finances, and by the fact that the large and unprecedented redemption of the principal of the bonded debt of the United States during the last eight years has seriously crippled the Treasury, not leaving a sufficient balance for convenient working purposes. Since August 3, 1805, the bonded debt of the United States has been reduced from $2,383,033,315 to $585,034,810, a reduction of $1,797,998,505; and during the last eight years, under the Administrations of Presidents Cleveland and Harrision, the principal of the public debt was reduced by the enormous sum of $597,168,500, not mentioning premiums or interest maid.

The large increased expenditures of the Government, including pensions, would amply justify the replacing of a perticulant this debt at a low rate of interest and would be a practical and absolute security for the maintenance of the gold standard in this country, and such limited bimetallism as we are enabled to maintain in the face of the fact that silver has become so largely depreciated through its disuse as money of ultimate redemption by the leading nations of Europe.

Coupled with the provision for securing the necessary gold to maintain specie payments and to secure the redemption of all our paper money on demand in gold, the parity of all our money would be maintained; and the provision for the additional use of silver to the extent of $100,000,000 in a period of over four years would not injure the maintenance of bimetallism in this country. I believe the country would approve such action on our part, adding to our small money of domestic use a limited number of silver dollars each month, such as may be justified by the relative increase of population and business, and strengthening the gold reserves in the Treasury to meet any demands upon it for foreign exchange.

Exchange.

I am aware that there exists a great prejudice in the minds of some people against any renewal of the bonded indebtedness of this country. I am aware that a party in power may hesitate to meet a charge of having fastened another bonded indebtedness upon the "tolling millions." There has been, in my judgment, a timidity and a fear to act promptly upon this subject, at a time when if action had been taken, I believe the present panic would have been averted. One Administration going out did not act because the gold reserve was not actually invaded; another Administration coming in hesitated to act; and thus between the "two stools" this necessary measure "fell to the ground."

ministration coming in hesitated to act; and thus between the "two stools" this necessary measure "fell to the ground." I believe that any party and any Administration ought to be brave enough to face any issue and to act energetically and promptly. I have great respect for the present Secretary of the Treasury, and I have great confidence in and even admiration for the President, whom I have personally known to have been tried in the balance in a critical emergency and not to have been found wanting; and I wish to say that I shall never forget the support I received from that source during a time of most critical emergency, when I occupied the position of Governor in a Western Territory, under the former Administration of President Cleveland.

But it is perfectly astounding to me that an Administration sits supinely by and sees the public credit go to ruin and does not do something to prevent it at an exigency like this. "An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure," and it has been said that in financial matters it is worth a ton. If our gold leaves us in February and March and there is a run on the Treasury—presto! change—we may have the silver standard in forty-eight hours. The serious situation now is the condition of the Treasury and

The serious situation now is the condition of the Treasury and the small gold reserve, not silver purchases alone, which have been virtually annulled by the Treasury ruling as to the market price of silver. Now, it may be asked what would be the effect of going on to a silver basis; it may be said "What do we care for that?" But is it not evident that, if we should go on to a silver basis, the present currency would be contracted by the withdrawal of all the gold that is at present in circulation? It would no longer perform the functions of money, but would become hoarded and become a commodity. Think of the result of the withdrawal of about seven hundred millions of gold from circulation in this country! Is not the thought of such a possibility, not to say such a prospect, sufficient to arouse the Administration and to cause the Congress of the United States to strengthen the hand of that Administration?

We are not here as partisans, Democrats, Republicans, or Populists; but we are here to maintain the credit and power and glory of this great nation, of this great country, full of resources, full of energy, and of great productive power. Why should we cripple ourselves by lack of foresight and lack of nerve? Who fears an electioneering cry when danger to his country confronts him? The credit of a great nation involves the credit of every institution and every individual under it. If investors seek to put out their money, do they resort to a country whose governmental finances are enfeebled and shattered? Do investors in any great numbers seek their fields of investment in the Argentical country whose governments in the country when the c mental finances are enfeebled and shattered? Do investors in any great numbers seek their fields of investment in the Argentine Republic, or even in Mexico?

No. They go to the countries that are strong and vigorous and prosperous, to those countries where credit is being built up rather than run down and destroyed. Why should we not as a nation obtain two or three hundred millions of money, in good part probably from abroad, at a low rate of interest? If a people want money why not get it on their best securities at the lowest rate? It brings so much more money into this country, and every man, woman, and child gets an indirect benefit therefrom. Every man and every institution would feel the electrical thrill want money why not get it on their best securities at the lowest rate? It brings so much more money into this country, and every man, woman, and child gets an indirect benefit therefrom. Every man and every institution would feel the electrical thrill of pride, of pleasure, and of prosperity!

When an individual wishes to borrow money, does he take his poorest securities and pay the highest rate of interest, or does he take his best securities and obtain money at the lowest rate of interest? What is true of an individual is true of a nation. If we would bear up our heads as one of the great nations of the earth, we must be able to meet them on common ground. They have chosen the ground of gold, and I say let us meet them on that plane. We are able to do it, and why should we play a second part when we are able to be a leading character as a nation on the great stage of the world's drama? It is but a short time since we were able to place a limited number of bonds bearing a rate of interest at 2 per cent per annum; and I trust we shall soon see the time again. I would give num; and I trust we shall soon see the time again. I would give the Secretary of the Treasury authority to pay whatever rate of interest may be necessary up to 4 per cent per annum, because the rate of the Bank of England occasionally reaches that figure, and I would trust to the discretion of the Secretary to place the and I would trust to the discretion of the Secretary to place the bonds at as low a rate as possible. The mere fact of giving the Secretary the authorization to issue these bonds may be sufficient without ever issuing a bond. What the investors of the world desire to know is what the intentions of the Government may be in relation to maintaining its credit. Away, then, with may be in relation to maintaining its credit. Away, then, with this timidity and half-heartedness. Let the Government of the United States assert itself inno uncertain tone; and then, from this beggarly and pitiable condition, we shall rise to the dignity of masters of the situation.

With plenty of gold in our lockers we can carry all the silver we place in our circulation up to one thousand millions, but, now that the fight is on, without gold we shall be degraded to the condition of a second-class monetary power. The great nations of the world have decided that gold is the thing to be fought for. Like true Americans let us do our fair share of the fighting! Such action on our part may make the other great nations somewhat more reasonable on the subject of silver; because they will need it, in large measure, to supplement their own depleted

We have a gold basis now which was won under circumstances of peculiar trial and adversity—under a great war debt. Let us maintain it and take no steps backward. The people of this country are accustomed to toil, and privation, and hardship; they love their country and its institutions, and will not play second to any power on the face of the earth. They want the best and what the world regards as the best; and they will have it even at some cost in dollars and cents. The national honor requires that this Congress shall stand by the people of the United States in maintaining the great and colossal credit of this Government. They will not excuse any party that degrades them by its cheese-

There can be no question that the distress which has been largely the cause of the recent panic, and which even now is laying business prostrate, arose in its incipiency from a belief, well founded or otherwise, that the United States could not continue ad infinitum the absorption of a depreciated and depreciatand anyment the absorption of a depreciated and depreciating metal, silver, in its currency system without seriously jeopardizing the gold standard in this country. The result of the silver policy of this country, which was commenced on March 1, 1878 (but only in the form of gold payments for silver since the passage of the act of July 14, 1890), has been to steadily diminish the gold reserve of the Treasury and to largely increase, both in circulation and in the receipts of the Government, the currency head on silver. This week paring process more silver and rency based on silver. This weakening process, more silver and less gold, has gone on until the danger line has been reached.

Without entering into any discussion of the circumstances which have led to this situation in the Senate, without dwelling on the injustice of suddenly and without notice destroying the silver industry in this country—which the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] has spoken about so earnestly, which industry is built up largely by governmental use as money—without discussing the wisdom of a policy of committing this country irrevocatly to the use of gold as money and closing the door to any further use of silver as money, it seems to me that it is the part of intelligent and patriotic men who earnestly desire to accomplish something that will relieve the present distressing situa-tion and at the same time prove for the best interests of all our people, to devise some plan by which we can continue to coin silver, for a limited period at least, in safe amounts, and at the same time provide a means for maintaining all our currency at par with gold and each kind equal with the other.

[I will say parenthetically, with reference to the product of our refineries, that there are ores, I understand, obtainable from Mexico, which, when used in combination with our refractory ores, are valuable, and enhance the value of our ore product by facilitating its reduction. Hence the language of my proposed amendment.]

This is what I have sought to accomplish by the amendment which I have offered, limiting the deposit and coinage of silver to our own product, and of that only to the extent of two millions per month, to be received and paid for at the market price. the seigniorage to be held in the Treasury as a reserve, and all deposits and coinage of silver to cease in about four years. Surely this will not do any serious injury to the country; and as my amendment proposes that the actual coined dollar shall be issued and kept in circulation, it will not increase the amount of credit money, but, on the contrary, will slightly increase the circulating medium in a small way, and should prove of benefit rather than of injury

It can excite no alarm, because it would be foolish to suppose that so small an annual addition of silver to our currency, especially in the shape of coined dollars, could be made an instrument of evil. If it were proposed to pay for this silver in legal-tender notes, interconvertible with gold, as under the present law, it is possible that some might look upon it as an additional means of depleting our gold reserve. This is the great evil of the present law, that we are issuing annually some $50,000,000 of legal-tender money redeemable in gold, in the purchase of silver bullion, and piling up the silver bars in the Treasury as a useless asset, while the notes issued in its purchase afford the exporters of gold a rare opportunity to obtain gold from the Treasury, weakening our gold reserves and injuring business

The same objection can not apply to this amendment as to the present law; and, if there is to be any use of silver as money in the United States in addition to what we already have, it seems to me that there can be no safer use than that proposed in my amendment. While enabling the mines of the United States to continue to produce to a limited extent and for a definite period this money metal, which has been used as money from the foundation of our Government, indeed as far back as we have authentic and historic record, by all governments, with due notice of a quitting point, it will serve as notice to the world that at the expiration of four years the United States shall cease to coin silver money; unless in the meantime foreign nations will unite with us in international bimetallism.

The United States is committed by its Constitution, by its attitude before the world in three international conferences, 1878, 1881, and 1892, and by its silver legislation for the last fifteen 1881, and 1892, and by its silver legislation for the last fifteen years to the use of gold and silver as money of ultimate redemption and full legal-tender power. It will be committed by the very repeal bill before us, as reported from the Committee on Finance of the Senate, if passed, to a continued use of silver in our currency system. All political parties in their platforms have declared for the continued use of silver as money. The people of the United States have therefore declared by their suffrages that silver shall be used as far as practicable in our currency system.

What kind of a spectacle would we present at the reassembling of the Brussels conference if, after having called the nations of the world together to consider "an enlarged use of silver in the currency systems of the world," we had in the meantime during the recess of the conference abandoned it altogether ourselves? The only way that bimetallism, (which every one seems to favor in the Senate, from the Populist Senator, PEFFER, to the great financier, SHERMAN) is possible under present conditions is by a limited use of silver sustained at par by large gold reserves. This limited and "limping" form of bimetallism we have now; and my amendment proposes to continue it under additional safeand in a limited manner. I have no disposition to place this country on a silver basis. I believe it would be the greatest calamity that could possibly happen; and under my amendment such a possibility is rendered impossible.

It may be said that such action can be revoked by another Congress and silver purphers and crimers and continued.

Congress, and silver purchases and coinage can be continued after the $100,000,000 limitation has expired; but the same may be said about the repeal of the present law, that another Congress could undo our action. But we can safely trust the American can people through their representatives in Congress, after full and fair discussion, to do what is right to maintain the honor of our country under all circumstances.

That is especially true at this juncture. and intellectual minority have contended on this floor for many weeks and months for that which they believe to be right and true and proper. Intimations have gone out from time to time that something strange, something unreasonable, something revthat something strange, something unreasonable, something revolutionary might occur. But it appears now, after all this discussion and agitation, that this great minority, so powerful in genius, in energy, in resources, in information, in philosophy and wisdom, are willing to show to the American people that the American Senate is a body that is willing to bow to the will of the majority without force, without physical test. I say that this is a grand triumph, not only for the genius of the American people, but it is a proud moment for the illustrious Senate of the United States. United States.

The amendment further proposes to remove the stigma upon our bonds by allowing national banks to issue circulating notes to the par value of such security. I know that a prejudice exists in many minds against the national banks of our country. Recognizing the fact that the present issue of national bonds will expire by limitation in about fourteen years, there is a disposition to refrain from any legislation that can possibly extend the life of the national banking system. The national banks were born of genius and in the great stress of war. I have but very little personal interest in them, not enough worth talking about; but such as I have I am not ashamed of; for I have never taken store in any bank except by borrowing money to do so, and because I regarded the establishment and maintenance of such an institution as being for the welfare of the community where I reside.

However, I am in favor of justice and fair play and the recognition of every power in this country that has tended or shall tend to the power and prosperity of its people; and I am forced to the conviction that the national banks have been a great benefit to the people and the Government of this country. Erected as they have been by the Government, they have been its supporter in its hour of need. They are founded and built up your own people, and there is no question but that they have assisted in extending aid to the people and have contributed to the development of our country even in its remotest bounds. I am satisfied they have materially contributed to the development of my own State, and that the people of that State have procured loans and received assistance at a lower rate of interest through the national banks than they would otherwise have enjoyed. True it is that out of the seventy national banks in the State of Washington some which have recently been established have gone to the wall during the late crisis; still, as a whole, they have been of vast benefit to the people, and with few exceptions, less in proportion than in some other States, they have maintained their existence in this hour of trial. They have added over $31,000,000 to the loanable assets of the people of that State.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Manderson] a few days ago had occasion to call the attention of the Senate to the prosperity of the banks in his State; and I took great pleasure at the splendid showing he then made for his great State; but I may be pardoned for referring to the fact that the State of Washington can show a record even more remarkable than he then presented to the Senate; for the statistics show that we have in the national banks in the State of Washington about 60 per cent more of capital per capita than there is in the national banks of the State of Nebraska. Of course, this incident cuts no figure in the debate. I merely mention it to show the benefit that national banks have been to the remoter States of the Union which have great resources and great prospects of development.

I look upon the national banks as an arm of power to the Gov-

I look upon the national banks as an arm of power to the Government and in behalf of the people. Naturally they are governed by their interests; but they are none the lesss a power which it has taken years to establish, and which can be and should be safely potentialized for the good of the people.

It appears by the last report of the Comptroller of the Curtain and the last report of the Comptroller of the Curtain and the last report of the Comptroller of the Curtain and the last report of the Comptroller of the Curtain and the last report of the Comptroller of the Curtain and the last report of the Comptroller of the Curtain and the last report of the Comptroller of the Curtain and the last report of the Comptroller of the Curtain and the last report of the Curtain and the

It appears by the last report of the Comptroller of the Currency that the actual circulation outstanding on September 30, 1892, for which the national banks were responsible was $147, 191,593. Thus it appears that the circulation had been largely diminished from what it was in 1882, 1883, 1884, when the average national-bank circulation was in the vicinity of $350,000,000, the height of circulation having reached $362,889,134 in 1882.

diminished from what it was in 1882, 1883, 1884, when the average national-bank circulation was in the vicinity of $350,000,000, the height of circulation having reached $362,889,134 in 1882.

Now, as I stated, these banks have been governed as to their circulation by what appeared to them to be profitable. The tax of 1 per cent on circulation, which amounted to $72,670,412.30 up to July 1, 1892, and the permission to issue circulating notes only up to 90 per cent of the par value of their bonds, had caused them to retire their circulation. During the recent panic, when the demand for currency of all kinds was so great that from 3 to 5 per cent premium was paid for currency with which to compensate the laborers of this country, the banks commenced to take out additional circulation, so that as I understand it, the circulation at present now amounts to about $210,000,000.

Many national banks have never taken out any circulating notes whatever. Such banks as the great Chemical National Bank of New York, the National Park Bank, the Merchants' National Bank of New York, and the National Bank of Washington, D. C., have never taken out any circulating notes whatever. Now, if the banks are allowed to take out circulation to the par value of their bonds, the probabilities are that the addition to the national-bank currency would not be confined to the additional 10 per cent of the national-bank currency now extant, but that many banks which have never taken out circulating notes, or that have never issued to the authorized limit, would be stimulated to issue notes; and it has been estimated that the national-bank currency would in the aggregate be increased to the extent of sixty or seventy millions of dollars.

Now, we know the benefit that was secured to the people by the additional circulation of forty or fifty million dollars that was obtained by the national banks during the recent crisis, and we can thereby reason that that benefit would be increased by the addition of sixty or seventy million more, making an approximate total bank circulation of from two hundred and fifty to two hundred and seventy-five million dollars. Now, I maintain that the addition of this representative money to the circulating medium of the country will add to the loaning powers of the banks and that the people will thereby be benefited.

I am not looking so much to the interests of the banks as I am to the interests of the people; and while I am willing to add to the money of final redemption by the coining of silver, I am also willing to add to the representative money, because this representative money is received in payment of debts, and thereby relieves the stringency of the money market in all these widely separated localities, where nearly four thousand national banks are established, about three-fourths of which banks have a capital not to exceed $150,000 each.

In other words, we can legitimately utilize the resources of the banks for the relief of the people. The banks are not taking out this circulation for idle purposes. If they take out the circulation they take it out to be loaned; and why should we not avail ourselves of every lawful means at our disposal for the good of the people? The Government of the United States will pay all the bonds at their face value; nobody questions that. There is no chance whatever of loss in issuing currency up to their face value. At a time during the war when the bonds of the Government were sold or likely to go below par, it was different. It was then wise to issue currency to only 90 per cent of their par value. Now the conditions are changed, and these bonds bear a premium, excepting the extended 2 per cent bonds, which can be called in at the pleasure of the Government. There is ample security to the Government, which guarantees the circulation of the banks, and the people ought to have the benefit of the loanable funds to be derived by extending such circulation.

Some people imagine that the national banks have had something to do with bringing about the present stringency; but every man that knows about State banks is aware that they were in the same condition as national banks in regard to this proposition during the panic. There is no difference whatever between State and national banks as to their willingness to put out money. The reluctance is not chargeable to national banks as such. They simply obeyed the common instinct of self-preservation and the doctrine of "the devil catch the hindmost."

Nor am I in favor of crippling the national banks. To use an old adage, "I would not cut off my nose to spite my face." I would give them all safe, legitimate additional power to be of service to the people, even if they do incidentally make an earning thereby for themselves.

Now, finally, Mr. President, my object in bringing forward these propositions in the form of this amendment is for the purpose of securing without delay such action by the Government of the United States as may placate existing conditions, such as will afford relief to those who are in distress, such as will maintain the credit of the Government, such as will preserve the position of our Government in reference to the doctrine of bimetallism, such as will, if possible, end for the present the agitation, embarrassment, and trouble on this subject. The chairman of the Committee on Finance has announced that as soon as the present repeal bill is disposed of he intends to introduce other financial measures. He, and a majority of his committee are known to be the friends of silver, and of the continued and enlarged use of it as money.

A bill has been introduced by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] providing for the increase of national-bank circulation on the terms that I propose; and I am largely indebted to him for the language that I have used in this particular part of my amendment. This shows the drift of sentiment, of reason.

Is it not practicable for us, after all these weeks and months

Is it not practicable for us, after all these weeks and months of debate, to determine finally for the American people the lines that we ought to adopt in this monetary legislation for their benefit? Is it necessary that, after repealing the Sherman law under the terms of the present bill, we should wait and struggle and go through a long period of debate, of exciting comments on all hands before coming to such a solution of the main questions at stake as to meet the reasonable requirements of the American people in this great emergency?

This Congress has other important subjects to which its attention should be addressed. Other great subjects are practically before it, such as affect the credit and business of our people. Ido not mean the election bill. Idoubt very much if it was a wise thing to introduce a subject of that kind which has strong partisan characteristics at this time. Every man should be stirred with the feeling of patriotism, the feeling that is as important in time of peace as in time of war. What we need to do is to give relief to the people of this country, and that relief should not "stand upon the order of its going" but should come at once. Great vital matters are to be the subjects of legislation.

It has been announced by the President that we are to have a revision of the tariff. I stand ready to welcome any and every wholesome revision; such revision as ought to take place, from time to time, in the tariff schedule, corresponding with the needs of the country and the developments in its business; but there is no mistaking the fact that the next great question that the people of the United States stand upon tiptoe to hear and to understand and to await the result of the action of this Congress, is that relating to the perpetuation of the industries of this country. We can not shirk it. It is before us. The last election made it a great fact which we must solemnly encounter.

In my judgment, quite as much importance is to be attached to the solution of that question, so far as it relates to the prosperity of this country, as to the present question before the Senate of the United States; and I say again, in that matter as in ate of the United States; and I say again, in that matter as in this, it is needful that there be action, that there be result, and that there be lines laid upon which men can predicate their business and their prospects. Let the future policy of the Government become known.

If men and fortunes and industries and wages are to be scaled down or wiped out, let us know it! Men are awaiting their fate; and while I belong to that party that believes in the preservation and the conservation of forces, in keeping within ourselves all that there is of value, in building ourselves up by every legitimate means, yet if there is an industry to be finally paralyzed which new stands doing rothing and awaiting the variety to a second a second control of the cont which now stands doing nothing and awaiting the verdict, I say, which now stands doing nothing and awaiting the verdict, I say, let it come. Let us know the worst, let us prepare for it; and the sconer we know what is to be the result of the exercise of the wisdom and the political power of those now in the ascendency in our Government, the better for our people.

If there is to be an alleviation anywhere, let us know it. If the foundations and superstructure of any great industry are to be uprooted and destroyed, let us know it—let us "take our medicine." Then, when we get to the bottom, we can commence to cine." Then, when we get to the bottom, we can commence to rear new things, new industries; and if we can not run, we can walk; if we can not walk, we can crawl; if we can not crawl, we can live. But let us have a settlement. The books are open; the party is in power; and the American people, like the criminal in the chair, calmly awaits the fate of electrocution.

But if, as the President intimated in his letter of acceptance, this is not to be an oppressive and destructive era for American industries, then let us know what the benign and clement power industries, then let us know what the benign and clement power industries, then let us know what the benign and element power shall decree. Then will business begin to resume; feeble it may be, but never disheartened. Then will the American people rise to the height of the situation, and, as they have always done, will show their superiority to every incident of politics; and though they may be down to-day they will rise to-morrow, and meet the suggestion in the lines of Gerald Massey, the poet of labor, who wrote of the poor man's child as being "hustled and sweated down" (like sovereigns in a bag) "till the image of God is worn from heart and brow." He sang:

But never sit we down and say There's nothing left but sorrow; We walk the Wilderness to-day, The Promised Land to-morrow.

Build up heroic lives, and all Be like a sheathen saber, Ready to flash out at God's call, O, Chivalry of Labor!

It may be the policy of the party in power to relegate all these positive financial questions to the future, and not to pass upon them now, but in the interest of early and immediate action on behalf of the people, I feel it my duty to present my views. I am not concerned as to the authorship of this or that remedy. It is not material by whom the legislation is introduced. I have my duty to fulfill and have thought long and earnestly upon the applied; and its second to the subject subject; and it seems to me that no good can be obtained by postponing the hour of action on the great problems that concern us; at least so far as relates to those things that are plain, cern us; at least so far as relates to those things that are plain, that any man having eyes can see, any man having ears can hear, and he that hath reason can understand.

If it be the pleasure of the majority in this Senate to postpone all positive legislation or action on these propositions to a future day, contenting curselves simply with repeal, I bow to their will; but I may be permitted to say there is no such good time as now. There is no escaping our responsibility; and the American people will render their verdict for unnecessary delay. When the time comes to yet or my amendment I will set that When the time comes to vote on my amendment, I will ask that it be taken by sections. In all the great debate you have listened to history, to statistics, to philosophy, and dialectics. I ask the Senate to do that which is practical for the immediate relief of the Government and the received.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, October 26, 1893.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by the Speaker.

Prayer by Rev. RUMSEY SMITHSON, of Washington, D. C., as follows:

O Lord God, our Heavenly Father, we offer and present unto Thee this day thanksgiving and praise for Thy manifold and great mercies toward us in the past, in the preservation of our lives, and in the bestowment of Thy blessings upon us.

We pray Thee to look upon us at this time in the forgiveness of all that Thou seest amiss in us. Cleanse our hearts by the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, that we may perfectly love Thee and magnify Thy holy name. Now, O Lord, we pray for Thy blessing upon this House and upon all the members of this body. We pray that they may be directed in all things to Thy glory and for the good of this great people.

O Lord, we pray Thy blessing upon the distressed of our race, and especially would we commend to Thee the family of the deceased Chaplain of this House. May Thy grace be their support, and may they have constantly the consolation that cometh alone from Thee.

alone from Thee.

Guide us all by Thy counsel, and finally receive us to Thyself, through Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ACKNOWLEDGMENT TO FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS.

The Speaker laid before the House the joint resolution, with Senate amendments (H. Res. 66), that the acknowledgments of the Government and the people of the United States be tendered to various foreign governments of the world who have partici-pated in commemoration of the discovery of America by Christopher Columbus.

The amendments of the Senate were read.

Mr. HOUK of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, this resolution passed the House a week or two ago. There is no change in its phraseology, and the amendment only provides that the information of its passage be conveyed to the different foreign governments by the President of the United States instead of by the Secretary of State. I will only say that the resolution, as originally offered and passed in the House was drawn upon consultation with the of State. I will only say that the resolution, as originally offered and passed in the House, was drawn upon consultation with the Secretary of State as to its form, in regard to the manner in which the acknowledment should be presented to other governments; but the Senate amendments are entirely in accordance with propriety, I think, and I move, therefore, that the amendments of the Senate be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

The title of the resolution was amended to conform to the body of it.

DEATH OF CHAPLAIN OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk, and ask for its immediate considera-

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Rev. Samuel W. Haddaway, Chaplain of the House.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to his memory the Speaker appoint a committee of seven to attend his funeral services.

The resolution was agreed to; and in accordance therewith the Speaker appointed as such committee Mr. Compton, Mr. Richardson of Tennessee, Mr. Dingley, Mr. Kyle, Mr. Cockrell, Mr. Curtis of New York, and Mr. Cobb of Alabama.

WORLD'S FAIR COMMISSIONER FROM ALASKA.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The bill was before the House a few days ago, and an explanation was asked for by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILGORE] which explanation I now have from the Treasury Department I desire to have that explanation read in connection with the

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 913) for the relief of Louis L. Williams

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, directed to pay to Louis L. Williams the sum of $305.70 due him as salary and for expenses incurred in the discharge of his duties as World's Fair Commissioner from Alaska.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill. Mr. SAYERS.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HEARD] that an amendment be offered after the word "cents," in line 5 of this bill, to insert the words "out of moneys heretofore appropriated for such purposes.

"out of moneys heretofore appropriated for such purposes."

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire to ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], as there are many commissioners who may have such bills as this, whether he has sufficiently examined the matter, so that he is willing to have this established as a precedent.

Mr. HEARD. I desire to say to the gentleman from Maine that there can be no great number of these cases, as there are only two commissioners from Alaska. The point made against the payment was raised in the State Department as to whether Alaska was a Territory in the meaning of the law authorizing the appointment of such commissioners from the different States and Territories of the Union.

Mr. DINGLEY. Is that the only point involved?

Mr. DINGLEY. Is that the only point involved?

Mr. HEARD. That is the only point involved, and the Attorney-General decided that it was a Territory in the contemplation of the law. The letter of the Treasury Department makes perfectly clear the reason why the claim has not been paid, and that it is equitably due, but can be paid only by authority of web are not act this.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will report the letter.

The letter was read, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE FIRST AUDITOR,

Washington, D. C., October 25, 1893.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your request that the reason be stated why this office considers it necessary that a special act be passed for payment of the expenses of Louis L. Williams as one of the commissioners to represent Alaska on the World's Columbian Commission from November 2 to December 12, 1890, instead of allowing them from the regular appropriation, as has been done since December, 1890.

It appears that the governor of Alaska nominated Mr. Williams on June 10, 1890, but the State Department on November 25, 1890, referred to the Attorney-General the Question whether Alaska is a Territory within the meaning of the act creating the World's Columbian Commission, on December 19, 1890. The Attorney-General decided affirmatively, and December 29, 1890, Mr. Williams's commission was issued.

In the meantime it appears that Mr. Williams actually traveled in November, 1890, from Alaska to Chicago, and was present at the commission's meeting, and his expenses would have been allowed had the question not been raised in the State Department, by which the issuing of his commission. Was delayed, this office only allowing expenses after the date of the commission.

It appears that Mr. Williams is equitably entitled to payment, and that this cas: only be accomplished by a special act of Congress.

I transmit by you herewith a copy of the letter from the Secretary of the First Comptroller, payment is refused for the reason given above.

Respectfully,

E. P. BALDWIN, First Auditor.

Hon. John T. HEARD, House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request for the resent consideration of this bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the amendment I suggested be read.

The Clerk read as follows: Insert, after the word "cents" in line 5, the following: "out of moneys eretofore appropriated for such purposes."

Mr. HEARD. I have no objection to the amendment. The SPEAKER. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

There was no objection, and the amendment was agreed to The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HEARD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

POST-OFFICE BUILDINGS.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the correction of a reference of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk. The title was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3440) to provide for post-office buildings.

The SPEAKER. This bill has been referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Koads. That committee will be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it will be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

ENGROSSMENT OF BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a privileged report from the Joint Commission appointed Mr. Speaker, I desire to to Investigate the Executive Departments of the Government.
It is a concurrent resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will first report the concurrent resolution submitted by the commission.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I ask that we have order.

as this is a matter of some importance.

The SPEAKER. This is an important matter, as it relates to the engrossment and enrollment of bills.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, by the House of Espresentatives (the Senate concurring). That, be mining with the first day of the regular session of the Fifty-thril Congress, to wir: the first Monday in December, 1893, in lieu of being engrossed, every bill and joint resolution in each House of Congress at the stage of the consideration at which a bill or joint resolution is at present engrossed shall be printed, and such printed copy shall take the place of what is now known as, and shall be called, the engrossed bill or resolution, as the case may be, and it shall be dealt with in the same manner as engrossed bills and joint resolutions are dealt with at present, and shall be east with at present, and shall be dealt with by that House, and its officers in the same manner in which engrossed bills, and joint resolutions are now dealt with.

Resolved, That when said bill or joint resolution shall have passed both Houses, it shall be printed on parchment, which printshall be in fleu of what is now known as and shall be called the enrolled bill or joint resolution, as the case may be, and shall be called the enrolled bill or joint resolution, as the case may be, and shall be called the enrolled bill or joint resolution, as the case may be, and shall be called the enrolled bill or joint resolution, as the case may be, and shall be called the enrolled bill or joint resolution, as the case may be, and shall be dealt with in the same manner in which enrolled bills and joint resolutions are now dealt with.

Resolved, That the Joint Committee on Printing is hereby charged with the duty of having the foregoing resolutions properly executed, and is empowered to take such steps as may be necessary to carry them into effect, and provide for the speedy execution of the printing herein contemplated.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now read the report.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now read the report. The report (by Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee) was read, as

Report of the Joint Commission to inquire into the status of the laws or ganizing the Executive Departments of the Government, etc.

The commission have considered the House concurrent resolution in reference to the engressing and enrolling of bills and joint resolutions, and have inquired into and made an investigation of the matters involved therein. The object of this inquiry and investigation was primarily the prevention of mistakes and errors in such engressment and enrollment; and, secondarily, a reduction of the expenses thereof. Much complaint has arisen by reason of the errors and mistakes which occur at every session of Congress in the measures which pass that body. It is believed, and it is doubless true, that in nearly every instance such errors are directly traceable to the clerical force engaged in the work of engrossing and enrolling these measures. In the nature of things it is almost impossible to prevent them oftentimes in the haste in which the work is done.

The commission have made investigation into the methods pursued in the legislative bodies of other countries than our own in respect to these matters. They have also made inquiry as to the eystem followed in some of the States of the Union. It is found that in nearly all the leading foreign parliamentary bodies, and in several of our own States, the old method or system of engrossment and enrollment by hand, with ink and pen, has been abandoned. As far back as 1849 the Parliament of Great Britain abandoned this method, and adopted that of printing. They applied it at first only to bills of a public or general character for both houses. It was found, however, that the new "arrangement was so productive of economy, convenience, and dispatch, and tended so much to lessen the chance of errors, that they speedily applied it to private bills, and resolutions of overy character. The commission is informed by a recent communication received from an officer of that Parliament that since 1849 the practice then adopted has been constantly followed.

It is believed by the commission that the change to printing will largely prevent errors, and that it will considerably reduce expenses. It is not believed that any delay will result by reason of this change in the preparation of the measures which are to be engrossed or enrolled, as the printing can be done quite as expeditiously and it is claimed more rapidly than the errors, and that it will considerably reduce expenses. It is not believed that any delay will result by reason of this change in the preparation for the change herein indicated be reported favorably and be concurred in by the two Houses.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, as will be readily seen, this resolution contemplates a radical change in the method of engrossing and enrolling bills and joint resolutions It is well understood that the engrossment of every bill is had before it is read a third time in legal and parliamentary contemplation, but as a fact the practice is that it is not engressed until after it has passed through the House if it be a House measure, or the Senate if it be a Senate measure. This resolution does or the senate if it of a senate measure. This resolution does not change the time at which joint resolutions or bills will be engrossed, but it simply provides that at that stage at which they are engrossed they shall be printed, and that the printed form shall take the place of and be called the engrossed resolution or bill, as the case may be.

air. Speaker, the object of this resolution, as we state in the report, is not so much to economize as to prevent errors and

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I wish you would let me make my statement, and then I will yield to you cheerfully. It is sometimes extremely difficult to detect errors in manuscript. The manuscript copy of a bill is not always in the best handwriting, and errors are very liable to creep in and to go undiscovered

As stated in the report, much complaint has arisen by reason of the mistakes that have crept into the laws and have not been detected until after the adjournment of Congress, too late to prevent or to correct them. It is believed that by printing the "ongressed" copy errors will be much more easily detected, and if they are not detected then, they will almost certainly be discovered in the "enrolled" copy. The resolution provides for printing both the "temperated" and the "corporated" and the "corporated by the complete of bull and interest. the "enrolled" copy. The resolution provides for printing both the "engrossed" and the "enrolled" copies of bills and joint resolutions. The joint commission appointed to inquire into the machinery of the Executive Departments have devoted a good deal of time to investigating this question. They have obtained information from quite a number of foreign countries and also from some of the States as to the methods pursued in their legislative bodies. They have had considerable correspondence with the officers of the Parliament of Great Britain.

Some idea of the fullness of the correspondence may be obtained by the fact that the large bundle of papers which I hold in my hand includes only the information and the exhibits obtained from the officers of the British Parliament. I have here illustrations of the prints of bills and resolutions in England at the different stages as they progress through the two houses of Parliament. The joint commission, after examining the matter carefully, were unanimous in the conclusion set forth in the report. The only objection urged against the change which seemed to have any force was as to the difficulty of printing the "engrossed" copy of a bill, and also the "enrolled" copy, in time for them to be acted upon by the two Houses of Congress.

Upon that question we have examined the Public Printer and also the foreman of printing in the Government Printing Office, and from their statements and from the information we have received from foreign parliamentary bodies, and also from some of the legislative bodies of the States where this method has been adopted, we believe that the printing can be done just as expeditiously as the writing. If members will take the trouble to examine these samples of English bills, they will see at once that it would be much easier to detect an error in this print than in any manuscript copy, so that really the only question presenting any doubt is as to whether the work can be done as expeditiously in this way as by the old method.

I hold in my hand an enrolled copy of an English bill ready for signature. In making the investigation the committee found, I repeat, that the only objection that seemed to have any force was this one as to the rapidity with which the work could be done. Now, if a bill has to be written, whenever it is engrossed or enrolled we know that that always takes time; and inasmuch as a portion of the work can be anticipated with the printing press just as easily as it can be under the present system, we believe there will be no difficulty in carrying this resolution into effect. The officers of the Government Printing Office say that if they can have only three or four hours they can present the longest bill ready for the signature of the proper officers of both Houses and of the President.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Will the gentleman please explain how this change would prevent errors?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It is so much easier to detect the content of the proper in that the gentleman please explain how this change would prevent errors?

tect an error in plain print than in manuscript that the gentle-man's question almost answers itself. The enrolling officers of this House, first the Clerk, and afterwards the Committee on Enrolled Bills, have to scrutinize each bill and resolution, and, as I have already said two or three times, it will be very much easier for them to detect errors in print than in writing, and it is believed that by having an efficient proof-reader to aid them it will be almost impossible for a typographical error to creep into these bills or joint resolutions.

Mr. Speaker, I was saying, when the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. STOCKDALE] put his question, that the only serious objec-tion made to this change was that at the close of the short session of Congress, when we are compelled to adjourn at a given hour—12 o'clock on the 4th day of March—if a bill should be passed very late on the morning of the 4th, the printers might not have time to enroll it, but the same difficulty would arise if it had to be copied with pen and ink; and the officers of the Government Printing Office say that if they can be allowed three or four hours they can print and have ready for signature the longest bill that ever came before Congress. As a matter of fact, we are informed that at the close of the last Congress the last conference report on the last appropriation bill was signed before 5 o'clock on the morning of the 4th, which would have given the fullest time

The Public Printer and the foreman of printing in the Gov ernment Printing Office agree that if that were true generally there would be no possible danger of not having time to "enroll" such a bill and have it ready for the proper signatures and for the President's. The commission, therefore, have thought it prudent to recommend that Congress enter upon this reform. Since the English Parliament adopted it in 1849 they have adhered to it closely in every instance, and they say that under no circumstances would they now abandon it.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], who is paying attention, and who is a member of the joint commission, tells us that this practice has been followed in his State for a great many years, and he will describe to the House how it operates there. I now yield to him if he desires to address the House.

Mr. DINGLEY. As a member of the joint commission I joined very heartily in reporting this bill for a reform in the method of engrossing and enrolling bills by print rather than by writing. As has been stated by the chairman of the committee [Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee], this system of engrossing and enrolling bills by print has been in existence in the ing and enrolling bills by print has been in existence in the British Parliament since 1849, commencing at that time with public bills, and working so well with reference to them that in a very few years it was extended to private bills. Visiting England lately, I had a conference with the clerk of the British House of Commons, who said to me that on no account would they think of going back to the old method of engrossing by

But not only abroad has there been experience in this matter. but in our country several States have adopted the plan of engrossing and enrolling bills in print instead of in writing; and every State that has adopted this plan has continued and extended it, regarding it as a perfect success. In my own State of Maine this plan was adopted twenty years ago -at first with some doubt as to whether the work could be done expeditiously; but experience has shown that the work can be done as expeditiously as in writing; and the success in securing accuracy has been most remarkable.

Gentlemen will observe that engrossed and enrolled bills in print may be easily examined by members who are interested in the bills for the purpose of discovering errors. As the bills in this form can be read more easily, errors can be more readily detected, the examination admitting of a carefulness which is impossible under the system of having the bills in writing. Moreover, it is found that when the bills are put in type and printed, the careful reading by the proof-reader and the subsequent reading by the committees of the House and Senate will

Gentlemen are aware that bills are often passed in a hurry through the House and the Senate, especially near the close of a session, and that errors in enrollment have frequently ariseu. In several of the last appropriation bills these errors were of great importance in many respects. It is almost impossible, in scanning a written page and doing it hurriedly, to be able to detect every error that may exist. But in reading a printed page there is hardly any difficulty in discovering errors, especially when it is taken into consideration that these pages will be in the first place thoroughly read by practical proof-readers in the Government Printing Office, and that afterwards they will be subject to the inspection of every member of the House who cares to ascertain whether perfect accuracy has been observed.

So much for the efficiency and accuracy which may be expected from this reform. Now, as to the expense: Experience has shown that this system, instead of increasing the expense, will actually reduce it. In my own State the expense of engrossing and enrolling our bills has been reduced nearly 25 per cent as compared with the expense of written engrossment and enroll-ment by clerks. So that, in addition to greater accuracy and uni-formity and promptitude, this system will conduce to economy. I am, therefore, on this account, heartily in favor of the proposed As the system has been tried not only abroad, but in this country with such success, I hope the House will concur in this country with such success, I hope the House this proposition.

Mr. CULBERSON. Can the gentleman tell us what the difference in cost will probably be?

Mr. DINGLEY. It is estimated that the system now proposed to be introduced will cost about 25 per cent less than the system of enrolling in writing. But if that estimate should be a mistake, the change will certainly not cost any more. In my own State, as I have said, the cost is less. At any rate, the accuracy which the system will secure, even if the change should entail a little additional cost (which it will not), would compensate for some increased expense in the matter. some increased expense in the matter.

Mr. CULBERSON. There must be a great difference in the

Mr. CULBERSON. There must be a great difference in the cost of paper as compared with parchment.

Mr. DINGLEY. Under the plan proposed, only one copy, the enrolled copy, will be printed on parchment; the engrossing and extra copies of the enrolled bill which may be wanted will be printed on ordinary linen paper.

Mr. CULBERSON. How do you expect to correct errors which may occur in the enrolled copy on parchment?

Mr. DINGLEY. The matter must, of course, be freed from all errors before it is finally printed on parchment.

Mr. CULBERSON. I notice there are many errors in the work which comes to us in print from the Government Printing Office.

Mr. DINGLEY. Those result from reading the proof of bills in a hurry at a stage where thousands of bills are being preliminarily printed; but that trouble will not arise in connection with the engrossing and enrolling of the comparatively few bills that reach that stage when accuracy becomes vital. There will be, that is, the printing of the bill for consideration in either House—that is, the print we ordinarily have here, on ordinary papers, then there will be the reprinting of the bill after it is reported, which will be on ordinary paper; then there will be the printing of the engrossed copy upon linen paper; this will be after the bill has been amended in the House and Senate and when accuracy is supposed to be secured. Then for the final enrolled copy there will be careful reading of the proof by the skilled proof-reader in order to free the matter from all possible errors before the parchment copy is struck off. Thus there will be secured the highest degree of accuracy. And after all this there will then be the comparison of the enrolled bill, in print, with the original by the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman from Maine whether there is now any provision in the law or in our rules to prevent or prohibit erasures in enrolled bills? first, the printing of the bill for consideration in either House our rules to prevent or prohibit erasures in enrolled bills?

Mr. DINGLEY. After the bill has been enrolled?
Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes, I mean in the enrolled copy.
Mr. DINGLEY. Oh, of course the securing of a perfect enrolled copy is a matter which comes finally under the observation of the Committees on Enrolled Bills of the House and the

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, suppose it should turn out, even with the greatest caution the printers can use, that there should be substantial errors in the printed copy of the enrolled bill—the last printed copy—would it not be more difficult, let me ask the gentleman, and require a good deal more time, when time is the essence of things, to have it sent back to the Printing Office and make the necessary corrections in type, than to have a clerk to do it, where manuscript is used, with a pen?

Mr. DINGLEY. I think not. In any event, I think having the two reprints, and the accurate examination of the bill, which is necessarily required by a skilled proof-reader before the final print is made, it will be more likely to eliminate every possible source of error. But assuming that an error should be discovered in the enrolled bill, as it may be discovered in a written ered in the enrolled bill, as it may be discovered in a written bill. In that case there must be, of course, the reënrollment of the bill, or, rather, the page on which the error appears; and it would be just as much trouble to make a copy with a pen as to have a copy prepared in type. It would require, in fact, more time as a rule, because in many cases the change of a single word or two in the type would secure the correction required, whereas the whole page would probably have to be rewritten in the manuscript. Besides that, as I have already said, in this case there is a double or a triple reading of the bill, first by a practical proof-reader, who revises all the copy, then by the committee of the House, and by the Senate committee.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is it not true that on one occasion the misplacement of a comma in an enrolled bill made a differthe misplacement of a comma in an enrolled bill made a difference of many thousands of dollars in the revenues of the Government:

Mr. DINGLEY. That is correct, I believe, but that was in a written enrolled bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is it not true also that of all men on the face of the earth practical printers are more wedded to their own theories of punctuation than any other set of men in the world?

Mr. DINGLEY. But the gentleman must remember that in enrolling a bill for the final signatures the printer would not be allowed to exercise his own discretion as to the punctuation or even the use of words. He would be required to adhere absolutely to the copy, just as a writer would in the manuscript enrollment.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Do you think the printers in the Government Printing Office could ever be induced to follow copy when they think the punctuation is different from what they sup-pose it ought to be? If so, I would like to have the recipe for it.

Mr. DINGLEY. They would not be any more subject to error on that account than any clerk. They would be compelled to follow copy in a legal document which must be an accurate dupli-They would not be any more subject to error cation. At any rate, there has never been any difficulty in such direction that I have ever heard of. The fact that one has a printed copy before him leads to greater accuracy, because it is so much easier to read a printed document than a written one and to see exactly whether there is an error or not. Besides that, the printed copies of bills are in the hands of all members, and parties interested would ascertain the existence of errors in the sections of a bill before they are finally acted upon by the House and Senate.

The suggestion has been made that there might be some difficulty in securing the engrossment and enrollment of a long appropriation bill or bills, which should not finally pass till 5 or 8 o'clock in the morning of the 4th of March at the close of a short

ssion

Practically I think there would be no more difficulty in enrolling a bill in such a situation by print than is now experienced by writing. The practice now is for the enrolling clerks to engross beforehand all the sheets containing matters in which the two Houses have concurred, reserving only the sheets containing the points in dispute or in conference; thus leaving only two or three press to be engressed in the three or love house before three pages to be engrossed in the three or four hours before adjournment.

This is exactly what would be done if the bill or bills were to be engrossed and enrolled by print. Indeed, an entire bill or a part of a bill can be engrossed by print, in case of necessity, more rapidly than by writing, because the number of clerks that can be engreed the number of pages. But be put on the work can not exceed the number of pages. But the number of printers that can be put on the work is limited only by the large force of the Printing Office. A half a dozen printers can be putting a page into type at the same time, be-cause the page is printed from the type after it is set.

From every point of view engrossing and enrolling by print seems to me far preferable to engrossing and enrolling by writ-

mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I would like to ask the gentleman from Maine a question with his permission. Is there any provision in the constitution of the State of Maine limiting the sessions of the Legislature of the State?

Mr. DINGLEY. There is not.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Is there any State in the United States where this practice in regard to enrolled bills has been States where this practice in regard to enrolled bills has been adopted?

Mr. DINGLEY. There is not. Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Is there any in the British Par-

Hament! Mr. DINGLEY. Not any.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Then I would like to ask the gen-Mr. HOPKINS of Innois. Then I would like to ask the gentleman, or the commission, if the citation of the British Parliament, or the example of any of the States that have adopted this plan, will serve as a safe precedent with us where the second session of a Congress must necessarily terminate at a certain hour or a certain minute? In States where this rule prevails, or in the British Parliament, if it is ascertained that a bill valis, or in the British Parliament, it is ascertained that a bill can not be engrossed in sufficient time, they can make provision to extend the time of the sitting; but in Congress, at the second session, we must, whether the bill is engrossed or not, end the session at a certain moment. Now, it seems to me that this matter ought to be carefully considered by the House before so radical a change is adopted.

Mr. DOCKERY. But the gentleman from Illinois forgets that sometimes we employ the clock in extending sessions here even under the present system.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Oh, for a few moments, but not sufficient, I imagine, to allow time enough to meet an emergency that might arise if this new plan was adopted.

Mr. DOCKERY. Let me say to the gentleman further, that there is not a civilized government in the world, except the United States, which employs the present system of enrolling bills by the pen.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Well, there is no other government in the world that has just such a regulation that the legislative assembly must end its session and terminate its existence at such an hour and minute.

Mr. DOCKERY. I have no information on that question, and ask the gentleman from Illinois if he is prepared to assert that the statement he has just made is accurate?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I am prepared to defend the statement, if questioned by the gentleman from Missouri. [Laugh-

Mr. DOCKERY. The "gentleman from Missouri" is inclined to think that the gentleman from Illinois is mistaken.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The same trouble arises in reference to the enrollment of a bill with a pen; and, as I stated when I had the floor, as a matter of fact the last bill in one session of Congress was presented and the conference report signed before 5 o'clock on the 4th of March. Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Now, that is one separate instance;

but there have been many where the time was not sufficient without an extension of it to allow the work to be done.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It is well known that wherever there is a disagreement in matters between the conference committees it is usually on some one subject, and while considering that the remainder of the bill would be engrossed, except possibly a half dozen or a dozen lines, all the rest being pre-sented and ready for signature, and all that the printer would have to do when the conference committee had agreed, even as late as 10 or 11 o'clock on the day of final adjournment, would be to print five or six lines and insert them in the proper place in

These printers say there would be no difficulty whatever in doing that. All they would want would be a little time.

But, Mr. Speaker, if this system brought about a change in our methods of passing bills the last few moments or the last hour or two of a Congress, it seems to me it would be very desir-

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. It might be desirable, if the gentleman wished an extra session.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. If it was understood we could not get a bill through at the eleventh hour, it would perhaps be very well for us, and certainly would not work any

Now, the idea the commission have is not to let it interfere at first with our corps of engrossing and enrolling clerks. It is an experiment. It is tentative, in other words, as we propose to put it to work. We do not propose to burn our bridges behind us so that we can not go back to the other process if it be desirable to do so; but we believe it can be instituted, that it is a re form that ought to be inaugurated, and that much good will come from it. We want to begin it with the long session, in order that there may be ample time to get the force ready to do the work.

I want to say that we conferred most fully with our corps of clerks, with the gentlemen who have charge of engrossing and enrolling, and particularly with the Chief Clerk of this House [Mr. Towles], who has had very long experience in this matter.

And I want to say for him and to his credit, that this is a reform which he has been urging upon Congress for many years. He believes that it can be made most effectual. I can not see that there can be any objection to it, when we propose to test it in the method I have described.

the method I have described.

The question has been asked me whether it will interfere with our Committee on Enrolled Bills. By no manner of means. It is not intended to interfere in anyway with the system that is followed of engrossing and enrolling the bills. The engrossment and enrollment will take place just as at present, except the substitution of a printed for a written copy in each case.

With regard to the suggestion made by my friend the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] with reference to the printer controlling the punctuation, as a matter of fact he could not do it if the desired to do it. The measure with nucleus comit if he desired to do it. The measure with punctuation com-plete must be submitted to the chairman of the Committee on Enrolled Bills. He reads it and has the last opportunity to pass upon it, even if the printer has punctuated it improperly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. You have been in this Congress a good long time, and you have had a good many speeches printed, have you not?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Yes, a few.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Did you ever get those printers over there to print a speech as you wanted it printed, as to punctu-

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Perhaps not, but in such cases the Committee on Enrolled Bills did not review the proof, after the proof-reader had passed it in the Printing Office this case the last man to observe the punctuation would be the chairman of the Committee on Enrolled Biiis.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. They are no worse about it than other printers; but if they send you the proofs of your speech and you go through it and change the punctuation back to the way you had it originally, can you get them to fix it that way then?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Well, there may be difficulty about that; but I do not hesitate to say that you will find the proof-readers of the Government Printing Office, as a general thing, are very accurate.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know that.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Many of them have been there a great many years, and they study the question of punctuation as experts. Besides, it is well to say that the office has rules for punctuation, the object being to establish uniformity as far as practicable.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. But that is the very trouble about the whole business. The Government printers are, as I suppose, the crack printers of the whole country. They have their theories about how a thing ought to be punctuated and printed, and they are going to stick to them unless there is some power that compels them to change them. The matter of taste will

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The gentleman may be right in that; but that objection would not apply in this case, because our Committee on Enrolled Bills will not be interfered with, and can control the question. They will make the same reports; and it will be their duty to pass upon every bill and joint resolution to see that they are not only correct in every respect, but also in respect to punctuation.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Is it the intention to have this printing done at the Printing Office, or to have it done here at the Capitol?

Mr. RICHARDSON, of Tennessee. If it turns out that it can be done more expeditiously here, and if it is necessary to do it here, then a little printing press could be set up in some room of the Capitol, where the printing could be done at once; but it seems to me that would only be necessary at the close of a short session of Congress. If it is necessary, it could be done without any increased expenditure, of course, because it would be done by printers sent from the Government Printing Office, and with a Government press

Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask the previous question on agreeing to the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.
On motion of Mr. RICHARDSON, of Tennessee, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. SOMERS (when the Committee on the Public Lands was called). Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on the Public Lands to call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 683) for the relief of the heirs of Martha A. Dealy, deceased.

The bill was read, as follows:

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it snacked by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That the Commissioner of the General Land Office be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to allow the heirs of Martha A. Dealy, widow of David Dealy, to enter under the homestead laws; if the said David Dealy when Ilving were qualified to make such entry, the north half of the northwest quarter of lots 3 and 4 of section 16, in township 38 north, of range 2 east of Willamette meridian, and to allow Mary Younkin, widow of Moses Younkin, to enter under the homestead laws; if the said Moses Younkin when Ilving were duly qualified, the north half of the northeast quarter, and lots 5 and 6 of section 16, in township 38 north, of range 2 east of Willamette meridian, both of said tracts lying in Whatcom County, in the State of Washington, and to issue patents to the heirs of the said Martha A. Dealy, and to Mary Younkin for the respective tracts hereby authorized to be entered by them, upon their making such proof as is required by existing laws, and executive regulations, and in compliance with the requirements of the homestead laws: Provided, That the State of Washington, by the proper State officer, or officers thereto duly authorized by laws of said State, shall first select, or shall signify a willingness to select, according to the laws regulating selections of other land of equal area, to be taken and heid by said State in lieu of the land hereby authorized to be entered, and such selections shall be a waiver of any right of said State to the land above described as indemnity school lands.

"This last-mentioned bill, I am informed, was favorably reported upon by the Committee on Public Lands of both the Senate and House of Represent-atives; was passed by the latter, and only failed of passage in the Senate by the failure to call it up in time during the closing hours of the Fifty-second

"The present bill differs from the former only in the fact that in the previous bill the beneficiaries named were the heads of two families, Messre. David Dealey and Moses Younkin, since deceased, while the beneficiaries named in the present bill are the heirs of the original claimants and of the wife of the first named also deceased; and also in the fact that in the present bill it is made obligatory upon the State of Washington first to select, or signify its willingness to select, according to the laws regulating selections, other land of equal area, to be taken and held by said State in lieu of the land authorized thereby to be entered, which selection, it provides, shall be a waiver of any right of the State to saidland; whereas in the former bill the State was shaply authorized to make such selection.

lowing report:
A full statement of the facts and the merits of the case are set forth in the following letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,

Washington, D. C., February 1, 1592.

Sin: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt, by reference from you, of Senate bill No. 1504, entitled "A bill for the relief of David Dealy and Moses Younkin," with request for a report thereon. The purpose of this bill is to confirm the title of the beneficiaries to certain land in a school section, viz. Sec. 16, T. 38 N., R. 2 E., in the State of Washington, and to allow the said State to select an equal quantity of other land in fleu thereof in satisfaction of its school land grant

From affidavits and other papers on file in this office, it appears that David Dealy settled upon land in said section in March, 1884, having purchased the possessory right of one William Wood, who had, in the year 1890 or 180, bought the same from one Monroe, who was occupying the land at the date of survey, intending to claim it under the donation law.

The other beneficiary settled at a later date, having bought a part of Dealy's claim, apparently in the belief that it was public land by virus of Monroe's occupation thereof previous to and at the time of survey, which was supposed to have effected a permanent exception of the land from the reservation in favor of schools.

In order that it may be understood how such belief could be entertained a brief resume of some departmental rulings previous to and at the time may be necessary.

It appears that prior to 1878 the holding of the Department in references.

brief resume of some departmental rulings previous to and at the time may be necessary.

It appears that prior to 1878 the holding of the Department in reference to settlements on school land in California under the seventh section of the act of March 3, 1858, was that land to which the grant did not attack at the date of survey could not thereafter become subject to the right of the State although the original settler should abandon his claim or sell it.

In 1878 a contrary view was adopted, and it was held that the right to claim the land as excepted from the grant was personal to the original settler and that upon his abandonment thereof the land would revert to the grant or reservation, to the exclusion of subsequent settlers (Gates rs. California and Oregon Raliroad Company, 5 C. L. O., 155; Mette vs. State of California bidd., 164). This view was adopted on a certain construction of the language of the Supreme Court in the case of the Water and Mining Company a. Bugbey (96 U. S. R., 165). In 1882, in Perkins vs. Central Pacific Raliroad Company (L. D., 336). Secretary Teller, after considering the decision in the case mentioned and companing it with the explanatory comments made thereon in Mining Company vs. Consolidated Mining Company (102 U. S. R., 167), nold that the former case had been misconstruct, and reaffirmed the doctrine held prior to 1878. Secretary Teller, in a decision dated December 4, 1884, in the case of Giovanni Le Franci (3 L. D., 239), again reviewed the Supreme Court decisions and held that if a tract was excepted from the school grant at the date of survey it could not afterward be claimed by the State.

In August, 1886, the Department, in the case of the State of California of the case of clovannia to the case of the State of California of the case of t doctrine and prior to itsis. Secretary Yeller, in a decision dated becember 4, 1684, in the case of Giovanni Le Franci (S. L. D., 289), again reviewed the Supreme Court decisions and held that if a track was excepted from the school grant at the date of survey it could not afterward be claimed by the Sin Angues, 1688, the Department, in the case of the State of California of L. D., 169), again changed its opinion upon the question and announced he doctrine assumed in 1878 and discarded in 1885, which denied the right is enter school land in a school section to all except the original sectics. This holding has, since 1885, been several times affirmed, and is now the rule of the Department, not only with reference to California cases, but as of general applicability; and it was under this ruling that the claims of Dealy and Younkin to enter the land claimed by them were rejected by office decision of August 19, 1889.

From the foregoing outline of departmental decisions it will be seen that between the years 1883 and 1888 land in the predicament of that described in the bill in California was held to be public land free from the reversionary interest of the State, and open to settlement after abandonment by the original settler, whose occupation at the date of survey was held to except if from attachment of the school grantor reservation. It is true the decisions of the set of March 3, 1886 (10 U. S. Stat., 244), and not under the general law; but in the popular mind they received a general application, and parties might be about all him to be a seen of California arising under the seventh section of the set of March 3, 1886 (10 U. S. Stat., 244), and not under the general law; but in the popular mind they received a general application, and parties might be about all the present of seven and part from conclusive.

Younkin's settlement appears to date only from about March 1, 1889. It may benoted, however, that while the doctrine at present held by the Department under the California law had been announced in 188 a considerable amount of money in improvements thereon, it would seem that they are deserving of all consideration that can be shown them.

The bill is herewith returned.

Very respectfully,

The SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

The SECRETARY OF THE RELEASE.

In the foregoing the Secretary of the Interior concurs, From affidavits filed with this committee it appears that since the passage of this bill by the Senate, David Dealy has died, leaving a widow, Martha A. Dealy. The committee therefore recommends that the bill be amended by substituting the name of "Martha A. Dealy" for that of "David Dealy," wherever the latter occurs in the bill, and by making like substitute in the title. With these amendments the committee recommends that the bill do pass.

Mr. SOMERS. If there is no desire to debate the bill, I move that it be reported to the House with the recommendation that

It do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Oates, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, reported that the committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 683) for the relief of the heirs of Martha A. Dealy, deceased, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was ordered to be encrossed for a third reading, and

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and being engrossed it was accordingly read the third time, and

On motion of Mr. SOMERS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

mittee of the Whole.

Mr. SOMERS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the bill.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. OATES in the chair.

Mr. SOMERS. I now yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Chairman, Congress on the 14th of May,

Mr. DINGLEY. Should not the bill and report be read?
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas will suspend until the Clerk reads the bill.

The bill was again read.

The bill was again read.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Chairman, Charles A. Hall, a constituent, I believe, of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Wheeler], made a cash entry between the passage of the resolution, May 14, 1888, and May 29, the date of the promulgation of that resolution, which I will ask the Clerk to read:

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution relating to the disposal of public lands in certain States. Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That the public lands of the United States in the States of Mississippi, Arkansas, and Alabama now subject to private sale as offerred lands shall be disposed of under and according to the provisions of the homestead laws only until the pending legislation affecting such lands shall be disposed of or the present session of Congress shall adjourn. Provided, That any isolated or disconnected tracts or parcels of the public domain less than 100 acres may be ordered sold at private or public sale for not less than $1.25 per acre by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, when, in his judgment, it would be proper to do so.

Approved May 14, 1868.

Mr. McRAE. After the passage of that resolution, and before it was promulgated in the States named, a few persons made entries of what is known as offered land, the money was paid and all the requirements of the law complied with. This private and all the requirements of the law complied with. This private bill, introduced by Gen. WHEELER, was to confirm the entry of Mr. Hall. It was referred to the Laterior Department. The Secretary and Commissioner recommend in lieu of that bill a general bill, so that a few entries made between the dates named, covering a period of about fifteen days, may be confirmed.

Mr. HERMANN. I desire to ask the gentleman from Arkansas whether this bill pertains to all private cash entries in any part of the country between those two dates, or does it apply to the States named by the gentleman?

Mr. MCRAE. It applies to all the States where entries were

Mr. HERMANN. I will ask the gentleman whether this substitute has been submitted to the Commissioner of the General Land Office?

Mr. McRAE. It has not been. The Commissioner recommends that we pass a general law instead of the special act, so as to avoid the trouble and necessity of adjusting each one of these claims by a special bill.

Mr. HERMANN. And it only pertains to these suspended cash entries offered between those two dates?

Mr. McRAE. Yes, sir. It might be safer to limit to the three States, Arkansas, Mississippi, and Alabama, and I will move that mendment.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. McRAE. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. As I understand it, all the lands in your section are offered lands?

Mr. MCRAE. They were nearly all offered lands.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. They are not now.

Mr. MCRAE. They are not now, in the sense that they can be sold for cash.

Mr. HERMANN. I ask that the bill and report be read

Mr. McRAE. The report does not appear to have come from the Printing Office yet. I can tell you what the facts are. The Commissioner of the General Land Office and the Secretary have considered the bill, and recommend that a general bill be passed in lieu of the private bill.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Have you any information as to the amount of land covered by this bill?

Mr. McRAE. There were but very few entries of this character between those two dates. The report from the General Land Office did not specify the number of entries nor the area, but there are very few. The money has been paid by the applicants, and the Commissioner of the General Land Office thinks that the entries made during that period by men whose money has been accepted and paid in the Treasury should be confirmed.

Mr. HERMANN. Mr. Chairman, I think it is due to the House, upon a matter so important as this, that it should be put in possession of the opinion of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, as it is in his office that all these suspended entires Land Office, as it is in his office that all these suspended entires are, and inasmuch as the gentleman in charge of the bill states that the report is still in the hands of the printer, I ask him to consent that the matter be postponed until that report is printed and until we can get the views of the Land Office.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Chairman, I have stated the facts. The Commissioner of the General Land Office recommended the passage of a general bill covering this class of entries. I am willing to amend the bill so as to apply only to the States of Alabama, Arkanssa, and Mississimi.

Arkansas, and Mississippi.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I think these titles ought to be confirmed in all the States where men have paid their money and it has gone into the general treasury. We want such a law in our Western country where we have "offered lands. In your Southern States you have no offered lands now, as I understand. Wherever men have gone forward and made these entries, have complied with the law as they understood it, as they were told by the local land officers the law was, and have and their money and taken their receipts and that money has paid their money and taken their receipts, and that money has gone into the Treasury of the United States, there certainly ought to be some way by which the title to their lands can be confirmed onfirmed.

Mr. McRAE. So far as my information goes, I have never heard of any such cash entries in my State. There may be some. This one in Alabama is all that I have heard of, but the Commissioner of the Land Office informs me that there are a few other cases, and I hope the matter will not go over.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I have no doubt that confusion did arise in the Southern States in making the change from offered to unoffered lands, and I think there ought to be some legislation to give relief to those who suffered by reason of it.

Mr. HERMANN. Let me say that there are a great many of these suspended cash entries that were absolutely fraudulent in their inception, and that have been rightfully held up by the Commissioner. Now, I understand that this bill would virtually validate all classes of claims.

Mr. McRAE. It is not possible that there could be fraud in this class of entries. The lands were subject to sale at $1.25 an acre, and the purchasers bought them at that price and paid their money, so that there could be no fraud, provided the lands were nonmineral lands. It was purely a sale of land, and no settlement was required of the purchaser.

Mr. HERMANN. But the man might not have been entitled to make the entry.

Mr. McRAE. The gentleman does not seem to understand Mr. McKAE. The gentleman does not seem to understand that in the States in question lands that have been subject to sale for a certain period become "offered" lands subject to private cash entry by anybody. That was not the case in his State, but it was in these States. The resolution that has been referred to here withdrew all the offered lands in those three States, that was followed later in the same Congress by an act prohibiting the sale of any lands for cash, and now those States are on the ing the sale of any lands for cash, and now those States are on the same footing with you. But during that period, a time when anybody had a right to buy these lands, a few men did buy and paid their money to the Government, and I think their titles ought to be confirmed or their money refunded.

Mr. HERMANN. But the gentleman must remember that the law required that an affidavit should be filed in each case as to the nonmineral character of the lands.

Mr. McRAE. Certainly. The Government has had ample time to determine the mineral quality of the land.

Mr. COBB of Alabama, amount of land, I believe. Under the old law they could buy any

Mr. McRAE. Yes. Mr. COBB of Alabama. Now, would not the amount of land which was purchased between these two periods have something to do with the propriety of passing this bill?

Mr. McRAE. Certainly, if there was any considerable amount, but the Commissioner of the General Land Office says that there are only a few entries Mr. COBB of Alabama. But you are not able to inform us as to the exact amount. Mr. McRAE. I have told you what the Commissioner says. He says that there are only a few entries. I know of no large transactions Mr. COBB of Alabama. Would it not be better to refer this bill to the Commissioner to have him state the exact amount? If a man purchased a homestead, that might be considered in our legislation.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Suppose a man purchased 320 acres and paid his money for it and the local land office received his money and the General Land Office received it, and it went into the Treasury, do you not think his title to that land should be confirmed?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Not necessarily.
Mr. WILSON of Washington. If you should try to get the money out of the Treasury, you would think differently. [Laugh-

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Oh, there is no trouble about that. Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I wish the gentleman would help me to get some out. [Laughter.]

Mr. COBB of Alabama. I will do my best to help you.
Mr. McRAE. In this class of cases I understand that there can be no refund of the money except by a special act of Congress, and no man who has not followed the course of one of gress, and no man who has not followed the course of one of these private bills to the Committee on Claims and through Congress can appreciate the difficulty of securing its passage. You refuse to give these men the land after taking their money, and then you say that they must go to Congress to get their money back. It is an outrage, and the larger the transaction the greater the outrage.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Will the Chairman please have the resolution of 1888 read again for the information of the House.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Chairman, in order to avoid all question, I will move to amend the bill so as to confine it to those entries in the States of Mississippi, Alabama, and Arkansas. As a matter of fact it would not affect other States, but that amendment will avoid any question about it, and so I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. HERMANN. That will be more satisfactory.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "sale," in line 3, insert, "in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, and Arkansak," so as to read, "that all private cash entries of public lands subject to sale in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, and Arkansas,"

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Is there any necessity for providing for any other State except Alabama?

Mr. McRAE. The bill does not mention any State by name but the resolution which makes this bill necessary applied to the three States named.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this amendment. Inasmuch as the tendency has been, during the last few years at least, to make our land laws general, applications of the Union silve it seems to provide the control of the Union silve it seems to provide the control of the Union silve it seems to provide the control of the Union silve it seems to provide the control of the Union silve it seems to provide the control of the Union silve it seems to provide the control of the Union silve it seems to provide the control of the Union silve it seems to provide the control of the Union silve it seems to provide the control of the Union silve it seems to provide the control of the Union silve it seems to provide the control of cable to all sections of the Union alike, it seems to me that this amendment should not depart from that policy. I think our public land legislation ought to be general. But while I am opposed to the amendment I shall not make any obstructive opposition. The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. McRAE, it was agreed to. Mr. McRAE. I move that the committee rise and report the bill as amended to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OATES reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4244) to confirm cash entries of offered lands, and had come to no resolution thereon.

The SPEAKER. The first question is on agreeing to the amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to call the attention of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE] to the fact that the word "case" in line 7 should apparently be "cases."

Mr. McRAE. Yes, sir, that is an error which should be corrected, and I ask that the amendment be made.

The SPEAKER. Without objection this typographical error will be corrected.

There was no objection.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time.

The question being on the passige of the bill,
Mr. COBB of Alabama. I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Public Lands, with instructions to ascertain the amount of land covered by the bill and the purchasers and the amount purchased by each person.

Mr. McRAE. I hope the motion will not be agreed to.
Mr. COBB of Alabama. Is the motion debatable?

Mr. GRESHAM. I am authorized by the Committee on Pubtic Lands to call up the bill (H. R. 4243) granting the right of way for the construction of a railroad and other improvements over and on the Hot Springs Reservation, Hot Springs, Ark.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole. Mr. GRESHAM. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the bill. Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Before that question is taken with a view of ascertaining whether exception will be made to this measure, I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GRESHAM] how many rights of the kind contemplated in this bill have been granted to railroad companies during the last three Congresses. I have not keptaccurate count, but the number is certainly very large.

Mr. GRESHAM. It is impossible for me to tell how many bills of this character have been passed by Congress.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. It seems to me that if this thing is to continue the Hot Springs Reservation will be gridironed with railroads.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. GRESHAM, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the bill, the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole (Mr. OATES in the chair), and proceeded to the consideration of House bill No. 4243.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc. That the right of way 45 feet in width, upon which to construct, equip. operate, and maintain a railroad with one or more tracks, is hereby granted to George W. Baxter, John D. Ware, Leslie Webb, and George M. Baxter, their associates and assigns, upon and over the West Mountain of the Hot Springs Reservation, as follows: Commencing at a point on first line marked A. 7 feet east of the line marked M on Government plat survey, 1862, for topography; thence by a route to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior to the boundary line of said West Mountain Reservation, or as near thereto as shall be necessary, but the said railroad shall not obstruct any highway contemplated by the plans for the improvement of the Government reservation of Hot Springs, Ark., and the said grantees shall, by the erection of substantial iron bridges with closed beds and sides, or by means of tunnels, avoid rendering the crossings dangerous to passengers on the said highways, either in conveyances or on foot.

SEC 2. That the said parties or their assigns shall cause to be made an accurate map and profile of the located line of said railway with the specifications for the construction thereof, and the same shall be approved by and filed with the Secretary of the Interior before the construction of said railroad shall be commenced. The Secretary of the Interior shall have the supervision and control over the location and construction of said railroad, which must be built and put in running order to the top of said mountain within two years from and after the passage of this act. Each of the conditions in this section shall be construed as a condition precedent to the grant herein made, and a failure to comply with any of them shall of itself work a forfeiture of the rights hereby granted.

SEC 3. That the said parties or their assigns shall have the privilege of erecting on said West Mountain observatories, hotels, and such other buildings as may be considered by the Secretary of the Interior desirable for the accommodation of the public, and for such purposes, and for laying off and beautifying a park surrounding or adjacent to such buildings the said parties or their assigns are hereby privileged to use 5 acres of ground upon said mountain, they agreeing to build upon and beautifying a park surrounding or adjacent to such buildings the said parties or their assigns are hereby mininged to the grounds to be used for the purposes herein mentioned shall be first submitted to the Secretary of the Interior and app agement of said property.

Sec. 6. That Congress reserves the right to at any time alter, amend, change, or repeal the rights and privileges hereby conferred.

Mr. RAY. Is there a report accompanying this bill?
Mr. GRESHAM. There is a report, but I think it has not been printed; and if it were at hand it would contain only the recommendation that the bill be passed. The purport of the bill is to convey to certain parties named the right to construct a railroad from near the foot of West Mountain, in the Hot Springs Reservation, to the top of it. The construction of the road and its location are absolutely under the control of the Interior Department.

Mr. RAY. It seems to me that on so important a matter we ought to have some report.

Mr. GRESHAM. I think I can answer any question of the gentleman, or give him any information he may desire in regard to this bill

Mr. RAY. Mr. Chairman, is it in order to consider a bill without the report?

Mr. GRESHAM. This bill was reported yesterday, and the report, as I have said, has not been printed; but a similar bill was passed in the last House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that under the rule any bill reported and on the Calendar may be called up during this hour.

Mr. GRESHAM. The regulation of the road, the amount of tolls, the mode of its construction, and all matters of that character are left absolutely within the control of the Interior Department, by which the plans are to be approved.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I would like to ask whether the bill in its present form has been submitted to the Interior Department'

Mr. GRESHAM. The Interior Department submitted a bill which the committee modified, putting in it many more restrictions than were proposed by the Department.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Is there now anything on record which will show the differences between the bill as recommended by the Interior Department and the bill as reported by the com-

Mr. GRESHAM. No, sir; I think not, because the bill as reported now is almost entirely a new bill, containing even more restrictions on the grant than were embodied in the recommendations of the Interior Department.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Does the gentleman in charge of the bill know whether, as presented to the committee now, this bill has received the favorable consideration of the Interior Department?

Mr. GRESHAM. It has every restriction placed on it that was suggested by the Interior Department, and many more, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. But that does not answer the uestion. Does the gentleman know whether in its present form the bill meets the approval of the Interior Department?

Mr. GRESHAM. I can not say; but as all the views he has suggested, and something more are contained in the bill, I do not see how he can possibly object. It goes beyond what he recom-mended even. Now, in the first instance, the bill as originally introduced here, did not provide for a limit to the right of way.

He suggested that there should be certain tunnels or iron bridges constructed at one crossing; but the committee made it general and provided that there should be no crossings on the highways at grade in any particular; and left the establishment of the grade well as the location of the line to the discretion of the Interior Department.

Mr. BRETZ. Will the gentleman allow me toask him a ques-

Mr. GRESHAM. Certainly.
Mr. BRETZ. I did not distinctly hear the reading of the bill, but if I understood it correctly I think it gives these parties five acres of ground?

Mr. GRESHAM. It gives them the use of that ground on the top of the mountain. Mr. BRETZ. What for?

Mr. GRESHAM. For a public park, for hotels and observa-tories, all of which is to be done at the expense of these people. Mr. BRETZ. By what authority is this railroad company authorized to order the construction of anything in the way of hotels or parks?

Mr. GRESHAM. This grant is to individuals, not to an ex-

Mr. GRESHAM. This grant is to individuals, not to an existing company, but to these parties for the purpose indicated. Mr. WILSON of Washington. If the gentleman will pardon me, I do not know that I have any special opposition to the measure, but I wish to say, if I may be heard for a moment, taking for granted, and I do of course, that every statement the gentleman has made is absolutely accurate, yet I think there seems to be creeping into this House a practice of reporting bills without the accompanying reports, or that information which the House is entitled to receive from the committee. I think that practice entitled to receive from the committee. I think that practice is a bad one and ought not to prevail. I think these committees should present their reports with every bill, and before the bill is called up that the report should be in possession of the clouse.

I think the House ought to have them for information.

We have plenty of time. Now, this morning we had two or three bills reported for consideration here without the reports attached, which the House ought to have, as has been the uniform practice, embodying information from the committee or from the Departments as to the measure proposed; and it seems to me, with all due respect to my friend from Texas, that the practice which has been creeping in here to-day is establishing a very bad precedent.

Mr. GRESHAM. I do not see how a report could be more explicit than the bill itself, as to its terms.

Mr. RAY. Do I understand that the Interior Department has recommended the grant of this particular right of way?
Mr. GRESHAM. Yes, sir; that is what I understand from their letter; and I will say further, that a bill was passed in the last Congress upon a similar recommendation.

Mr. RAY. Then you must have in your possession or somewhere in the files of the committee this particular recommendation or letter.

Mr. GRESHAM. We have, but it is rather indistinct. dently the gentleman who prepared it knew nothing about the construction of railroads.

Mr. RAY. It seems to me that we ought to have that communication before us.

Now, I do not want to stand in the way for a single moment of a proposition to grant the right of way in this case, if it is proper to be done, and the Interior Department, knowing the facts about it, recommends it. I will not do it. But it is a strange thing if there is such a recommendation that the committee did not report it to the House. I ask the gentleman, therefore, that the committee report that communication in order that we may have the information we ought to have, and if proper I certainly will not stand in the way, and I am sure gentlemen on this side will read?

Mr. GRESHAM. The gentleman simply wants that letter

Mr. COOMBS. We ought to have the report.
Mr. GRESHAM. The report does not contain the letter or anything but the favorable report on this bill.

Mr. RAY. Has this particular bill been referred to the Interior Department?

Mr. GRESHAM. No, sir. The bill originally introduced was referred to the Department, which returned it with certain modifications. These were all adopted, and power conferred on the Interior Department which enlarged very much its own recommendation. The bill he suggested designated a certain line on which the road should be constructed. The committee yielded to that suggestion, but left the location of the line to his own determination hereafter.

Mr. RAY. Whose determination?

Mr. GRESHAM. The determination of the Interior Department, because we had neither a survey nor a profile of it, and it was impossible to state what the grades might be or where the line should run until there was an actual survey, so we gave him power beyond what was asked for originally in his recom-

Mr. RAY. Do I understand the gentleman to say that this bill does not prescribe or point out the particular line?

Mr. GRESHAM. Certainly, sir; for the reason that the proposed line commences at the foot of West Mountain and climbs the mountain to the top; and exactly how that is to be done can not be known accurately until there has been a survey and profile establishing the alignments and the grade.

Mr. RAY. Let me ask the gentleman another question.

Mr. RAY. Let me ask the gentleman another question. Mr. GRESHAM. Certainly. Mr. RAY. What particular hasts is there in regard to this bill?

Mr. GRESHAM. I do not know that there is any, except that this is a measure that was passed by the last House.

Mr. RAY. Then why are you not willing to hold it back and refer this bill to the Interior Department? If they recommend it, I am quite sure that gentlemen on this side of the House would not oppose it.

Mr. GRESHAM. It is just simply the delay, and the difficulty of ever resching it.

Mr. RAY. It can be called up in any morning hour.

Mr. BRETZ. I understood the gentleman to say that these hotels that were to be built on the 5 acres of ground at the top of the mountain were to be built at the expense of the Government.

Mr. GRESHAM. No; at the expense of the parties who get this franchise. Before they can be constructed, the plans and specifications are to be submitted to and approved by the Interior Department. Mr. RAY. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that any party desiring to build a railroad over this reservation ought to come to this House with the profile of the proposed road, that it ought to be submitted to this House, so that the members of this House can exercise some independent judgment in the matter.

Mr. GRESHAM. How many of them could tall from the pro-file, when they get it, whether the road was properly located or whether the grades were proper or not?

Mr. RAY. It is perhaps immaterial how many; but at least every member of this House ought to have the right to exercise the judgment that he has, and to look into the matter and be satisfied in regard to its propriety. You do not know where this road would go, over what part of the reservation it would You do not know what other right it may interfere with.

Mr. GRESHAM. Oh, yes, we do.

Mr. RAY. It may cover some mines or interfere with some timber lands, or something of that kind. We know nothing about it.

Mr. GRESHAM. Yes, we know that it commences at the foot of the mountain and runs to the top of it, and we know also that if there are any great mines to be discovered, or anything else of that kind, that the Government can at its pleasure revoke the grant that it is now proposed to convey by this bill, at any time.

The trouble is, it seems to me, that there ought to be a profile of this proposed route, that any man who wants the right to go over this land should know first where he wants to go, and, in the second place, that he should produce to be made and presented to Congress a profile of the proposed route, show-ing where it is located, and how much land will be taken; and ing where it is located, and how much land will be taken; and then this House could judge with some sort of correctness whether it was proper or not that the right be granted.
Until that is done I want to say to my friend that I should feel disposed to stand in the way of the passage of this bill.
Mr. GRESHAM. I will say in regard to that, that if the line has to be located and the estimates made out for every railroad before the bill is passed, railroad companies would build very few miles of road that required Congressional action.

Mr. RAY. I would not care for the estimate, but gentlemen want to know where the proposed line is to be constructed, and what interests it might conflict with.

Mr. GRESHAM. Sometimes, before a route is finally located, as many as twenty lines will be run up and around a mountain, and the final route will only be determined after a full estimate as to which is the cheapest and the best route. That will have to be approved, in this case, by the Secretary of the Interior, before any work can be commenced.

Mr. RAY. Then, in effect, this House is asked to authorize these gentlemen to build a railroad anywhere upon this reserva-

Mr. GRESHAM. No, sir.

Mr. RAY. And then after they select a particular line they propose to submit it to the Secretary of the Interior, and if he says "go ahead" it will be all right.

Mr. GRESHAM. No. sir.

Mr. RAY. In other words, we in effect submit the whole matter to the Secretary of the Interior to say whether a proposed ter to the Secretary of the Interior to say whether a proposed route shall be occupied by the railroad or not.

Mr. GRESHAM. No, sir.

Mr. RAY. And Congress in that event would yield all jurisdiction over the matter to the Secretary of the Interior—

Mr. GRESHAM. No, sir; that is not the case in this bill.

The termini are fixed, and the road to be built between the two termini is the thing that is left in the discretion of the Interior Department.

Well, then, the proposition is you fix the two Mr. RAY. ends of the road ends of the road.

Mr. GRESHAM. Yes.

Mr. RAY. And the promoters of this enterprise may go anywhere on this reservation, round and round it, and over it and over it, and you leave it to the Secretary of the Interior to approve that. The Secretary of the Interior will leave it to some clerk in the Department to look into; so that this Congress surrenders its entire jurisdiction and discretion in the matter postably and probably to some clerk in the Interior Department. sibly and probably to some clerk in the Interior Department. Now, I submit to the gentleman, do you think that that is at all proper or wise? Do you think that this Congress ought to submit to any such thing as that?

Mr. GRESHAM. Yes.

Mr. GRESHAM. Yes. The CHAIRMAN. The hour has expired, and the committee will rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OATES, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 4243, and had come to no resolution thereon.
The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. WHERLER of Alabama, for four days, on account of important

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the special order. The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 139) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

BANKRUPTCY BILL.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill the title of which has just been read.

The motion was agreed to.
The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. OUTHWAITE in the chair.
The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of a bill the title of which the Clerk will now report.

The title was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. BCATNER. Mr. Chairman, it might be supposed that a measure such as the one now before the House, one proposing to deal with a purely business question, one having no political or sectional lines, would receive from this House a careful, a calm, and a dispassionate consideration. One would suppose, howfrom reading some of the remarks which have been delivored in the consideration of this question, that an infamous conspiracy had been entered into to deprive a large number of American people of their constitutional rights and privileges.

One would suppose that the bill struck at the firesides and the hearthstones of a large number of our constituents, and that the gentlemen who framed the bill, who introduced the bill, who reported the bill, and those who advocate it are entirely indifferent to the sufferings of their distressed constituents, and are willing tools in the hands of heartless Shylocks, to betray to oppress, and to outrage the people whom they have come here sworn to represent.

I challenge, Mr. Chairman, the consideration of this bill by any fair-minded man for one single atom of foundation for the violent charges and assertions which have been made against it.

I find, sir, in the remarks of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Drinson], delivered a few days ago, some violent diarribes and charges against the bill. He claims that it will despoil his farmer constituents of their homes, that it is "an infamous thing," and in general he exhausts the vocabulary of denunciation in declaring this bill ought not to receive the support of this House. When your corne to analyze his greech, Mr. Chairtion in declaring this bill ought not to receive the support of this House. When you come to analyze his speech, Mr. Chair-man, you find that the first great fault which he discovers is in the definition of insolvency. The next is that if a merchant does not meet his commercial paper in thirty days, and remains suspended for that length of time, that he is subject to the pro-visions of the act. The third is that national banks are not subject to the provisions of the act. The fourth is that the fees of counsel and the employés to look after the estate in the bank-rupt courts are to be paid out of the funds of the bankrupt surrendered to the trustee.

The fifth provision to which he objects is that relating to homestead exemptions, and his sixth point is that the farmers are substantially subjected to the provisions of this bill because they owe the merchants, and if the merchants are thrown into bankruptcy the farmers may be compelled to pay their debts. These points, Mr. Speaker, taken out of the gentleman's speech, constitute the sole basis for the charge which he has made against the bill as an infamous conspiracy concocted by one class of American citizens to rob and despoil another class.

Let us look at the definition of "insolvency." The definition in the bill is that a man is insolvent when his property, at a fair valuation, is not sufficient to pay his debts; a definition of insolvency known to the civil law ever since there was a civil law, a definition differing from the definition of the common law, inthat the common law declares that a man is insolvent when he fails to pay his debts, while the civil law holds that he is insolvent only when his property is not sufficient to pay his debts Now, how is a man's insolvency to be determined under any system of laws? Is he to say himself whether he is insolvent or not? Is any particular individual to say so? Is the judge to say 80? And whoever is to say so, must be not have some rules for his guidance, some rules by which to determine the fact in a legal sense?
Then, what fairer rule can be found than that his insolvency or his solvency shall be accertained by a fair valuation of his property, and that the verdict, the result, shall be pronounced by a fair and impartial jury who have heard the evidence in the case? Is it to be presumed that, simply because a man has been proceeded against in bankruptcy, the judge at once becomes a tyrant, at once becomes incompetent and dishonest, that the jury is to be packed against the victim, that the jurors will not consider the testimony, that witnesses will commit perjury to injure him. that the court will not decide according to the law and the jus-

Mr. Speaker, if that is a fair deduction, if any such deduction can be drawn in this case, then we ought to abolish all trials and all courts, because, whenever a man is brought before a court, upon any ground whatever, he is to be regarded as a victim, everything is against him, and he can not get justice in the tribunals of the land. To my mind, sir, that objection is absolutely absurd, with all due respect to the gentleman from Alabama. No man ought to be put into bankruptcy unless he is insolvent, and you can find no fairer means of testing a man's solvency than that which is proposed in this bill, to ascertain whether his property is sufficient, on a fair valuation, to pay his

But the gentleman asks what is a fair valuation? It is a fair valuation; that is what it is. It does not mean what his property will sell for under the hammer; it does not mean what his prop erty will sell for on ten years' credit. It does not mean what his property would sell for without proper effort to effect a sale.

It means just what it says, a fair valuation. It means that the appraisers and the witnesses who come before the jury shall be asked about their knowledge of the property, and about their judgment as to what is a fair valuation of it under existing con-

Mr. RAY. If the gentleman will permit me to interrupt him for a moment, I do not want to enter into any controversy at all, but I want to ask him whether he is arguing that every man ought to be put into bankruptcy, or that the law ought to permit every man to be put into bankruptcy, simply because he is

Mr. BOATNER. By no means, and this bill does not so contemplate.

I knew that; but I desired to bring it out clearly. Mr. BOATNER. This bill only provides that whenever certain other conditions named in it concur, and when in addition the man is inscivent, then he may be put into bankruptcy. Of course if every man who is insolvent were to be thrown into bankruptcy we would have a collapse in commercial circles in the United States.

Mr. RAY. I asked the question simply because I thought the gentleman was giving the impression to the House that this bill did permit the throwing of every man into bankruptcy simply use he was insolvent

Mr. BOATNER. If anything I was saying was producing any such impression I am very thankful to the gentleman from New York for correcting it, because I had no such idea in my mind.

Mr. DENSON. I will ask the gentleman when is this fair valuation to be determined?

Mr. BOATNER. The fair valuation is to be determined at

Mr. DENSON. At the trial; and yet you say in your bill that if the man, being insolvent, fails to pay his commercial paper within thirty days he may be hurled into bankrbptcy.

Mr. BOATNER. "Hurled" is a very good word. [Laughter.]
Mr. DENSON. Mr. Chairman, the very terms and the very reason of the bill itself show that the insolvency must be determined by the debtor himself within thirty days. I understand the gentleman from Louisiana to say now that he may determine there has been any judicial determination of the fact. being true, the debtor has got to determine it. Has got to de-termine it, and when? Within that thirty days, and every day within that thirty days.

Mr. BOATNER. If the gentleman has concluded his remarks
I will resume mine. [Laughter.]

Mr. DENSON. I thank the gentleman for the time he has granted me.

Mr. BOATNER. What I said was that a fair valuation meant a fair valuation. I know no simpler word in the language than the word "fair." It is an original word, belonging to the language than guage, and it has been in use so long that its meaning is well understood by the common people as well as by the courts.

Mr. BOATNER. Idecline to yield just at this moment. What I said was (and the gentleman from Alabama will not misunderstand me now if he did before) that this bill means that the stand me now if he did before) that this bill means that the property shall be valued fairly. It does not mean that the property shall be estimated by what it would bring under the auctioneer's hammer, or by what it would bring if sold for cash without the benefit of an appraisement, or by what it could be sold for on ten years' credit. The intention is that the court shall ascertain what is a fair valuation of the property under existing conditions, upon information to be obtained from witnesses who are acquainted with the property and know its

Mr. DENSON. Will my friend from Louisiana yield for a statement and for a question in the nature of a statement—short and succinct, I think?

Mr. BOATNER. I will yield for a question, not for a speech.
Mr. DENSON. What is to regulate this "fair valuation"— the condition of the money market, the demand for that particular kind of property, and the means at command for purchasing it? By the express terms of this bill must not the debtor himself, within thirty days from the time he fails to meet his commercial paper, determine this valuation?

Mr. OATES. The gentleman will permit me to say that no question arises on the exempt property until the adjudication in bankruptcy is made.

Mr. DENSON. I understand that; my friend from Alabama [Mr. OATES] certainly states that matter properly. But the question I am talking about is the principle of putting a man into bankruptcy on that ground. Whether he has property worth a million dollars or property worth only a few hundred, the question is how is the value to be determined? It must be determined within those thirty days. We have adopted, it seems, the gold standard, and the value of this property would have to be determined by the gold standard when there is to-day an insufficiency of gold in the land. And if a man can not pay his debts in gold his property is to be sold under this bankruptcy proceed-You put him upon a gold basis—the most excruciating machine of oppression ever conceived by the mind of man.

Mr. BOATNER. The gentleman evidently desires to open up a question which has, for the present, I think, been settled.
I have had all to say upon it that I desire to say at this time. Mr. DENSON rose

Mr. BOATNER. I begthe gentleman's pardon. If he desires to make another speech on the question, I will yield him the floor; otherwise, I must beg him to allow me to proceed with my

Mr. DENSON. I had no wish to interrupt the gentleman.
Mr. BOATNER. I have not the slightest objection to being interrupted by a question, but I do not want my argument broken in upon so that the gentleman will occupy the position of delivering a speech and I that of an auditor. I have read the gentleman's speech with a great deal of pleasure, and hope we may have the pleasure of hearing from him again on the same subject. But I desire to say a little myself about this question.

Mr. DENSON. On a gold basis?
Mr. BOATNER. On any basis you see fit to put it on.
I supposed that my friend from Alabama would understand that the condition of the bankrupt is tested by his position at the time the act of bankruptcy occurs

Mr. DENSON. And the valuation is to be made then, too.
Mr. BOATNER. I do not know that the bill so expresses it; but it is so clear a legal principle that it would be implied. A man is proceeded against in bankruptcy; the allegation is that he has committed an act of bankruptcy; the time when the act is committed must be alleged; and the condition of insolvency as a concomitant circumstance and necessary cause must be alleged along with it.

If the paper of a merchant goes to protest to-day and remains protested for thirty days, his condition at the end of thirty days, financially and otherwise, determines whether he is subject to a proceeding in bankruptcy. If he is insolvent on that day, he would, under the provisions of this bill, be adjudged a bankrupt; if not insolvent on that day he would not be adjudged a bankrupt; and in ascertaining whether he is solvent or insolvent the fact would be determined by a fair valuation of his property and a comparison of its value with the amount of the debter. and a comparison of its value with the amount of the debts

Mr. DENSON. The inevitable consequence of the gentleman's argument is that this "fair valuation" must be the cash valuation within those thirty days during which the act of bankruptcy is committed.

Mr. BOATNER. The gentleman is at liberty to draw any conclusion he pleases from my argument; but I must protest against being interrupted in this way and having a speech interjected into my remarks under the guise of asking me a question.

Mr. DENSON rose.

Mr. BOATNER. I decline to yield to the gentleman just now. I have not the slightest objection to his asking me any question pertinent to the bill; but I must insist that I can not engage in a discussion with him about the merits or demerits of this question.

I have already, Mr. Chairman, explicitly stated that in my in have already, Mr. Chairman, explicitly stated that in my judgment the meaning of the language is not the cash value of the property, but the fair value of the property; not the price that the property would bring under extraordinary conditions, but the value that it would produce in the ordinary course of business. If merchandise, it would be the value at which such merchandise in such condition would ordinarily sell for.

Mr. DENSON. What is the standard of value?

Mr. DENSON. What is the standard of value?

Mr. BOATNER (continuing). If it be the stock of a whole-sale dealer, then the value would be what that stock would bring at ordinary wholesale prices; if it be a retail dealer, then what the merchandise would bring at retail prices, taking into con-sideration the age of the goods and the period of the sale and all the conditions and circumstances surrounding the case. it be real estate it would be what the real estate would sell for at the ordinary market value of such property, partly cash and partly credit.

I therefore despair, after having read carefully the speech of the gentleman from Alabama, who has been interrupting me, I utterly despair of making the slightest impression on his mind or inducing him to understand any of the provisions of the bill from the standpoint of the ordinary construction of fairness and reason. For his remarks indicate that this bill is to him like a red flag to an ordinarily mad bull; it inflames his passions and resentments and stirs him up to sentiments which induce him to say that under no circumstances would he have anything to do with the infamous thing, as he chooses to call it. I am merely trying now in my own way to expose the utter fallacy of his premises and his conclusions.

To proceed. A merchant must pay his commercial paper in thirty days. Now, the gentleman from Alabama does not express any great concern about the merchant, but he shows where the shoe pinches somewhat, because he tells us if you put the merchant into insolvency the merchant holds the waived notes, merchant into insolvency the merchant holds the waived notes, judgments, and mortgages upon property of his farmer constituency, and they would all be brought under the jurisdiction of the Federal court by this process of law. How are they to be brought under the machinery of this law, I would ask?

The fact that the note or the debt that they owe falls into the hands of the assignee does not give the United States court jurisdiction of the suit on the claim or the notes they own. These must be enforced in the courts in Alabama, where your farmers have the benefit of the State laws and the exemption laws, and where they can not be any more oppressed by the assignee than by the merchant himself. So that argument falls flat, that the bill carries any hardship on the farming interest of the country

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the championship of the farmers by some of the gentlemen upon this floor is purely gratuitous and unnecessary. So far as I know the farmers of the United States pay their debts. In my own district I know it to be a fact that it is the rarest thing that any one has a claim for collection against a farmer. They are generally the best paying of the debtor class. It is a certain class of merchants who do not pay their debts, not the farmer; and the farmers do not ask any one toclaim for them exemption from liability on their contracts and immunity from laws enacted for the benefit of all.

The gentleman from Alabama found tremendous fault with the bill because national banks are not subjected to the involuntary provisions of the bill. Is the contleman is a subject of the involuntary provisions of the bill. untary provisions of the bill. Is the gentleman ignorant of the fact that the settlement of the affairs and the liquidation of the national banks is provided by the law of the Uni ed States, and which authorizes the most summary process for that pur-

Mr. DENSON. I made no objection about national banks not being included in the bill.

Mr. BOATNER. Well, the gentleman, if he did not make objection on that score, certainly had a great deal to say about it. He spoke at considerable length on the subject, and referred to the fact that the national banks had practically suspended payment; that they had refused to pay the checks of their customers against deposits; and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Cul-BERSON] suggested that the national banks by this process could lock up the money of their customers and force them into bank. ruptcy because they could not obtain money to pay their debts. The gentleman certainly is aware of the fact that under the law any national bank which fails or refuses to cash at once a single check drawn by any one of its depositors is subject to instant suspension, and to be placed in the hands of a receiver.

Mr. McMILLIN. And to have its deors closed.

Mr. BOATNER (continuing). Yes, to adopt the most summary measures; put it in the hands of a receiver and close the

They have not done this because they know the banks were justified by the public sentiment and the emergency of the situation in doing as they did.

In the interest of conservatism, in the interest of prevention of the enormous damage which would have occurred from the policy of allowing the banks to be entirely depleted of their deposits, this system was sanctioned by the Comptroller of the Currency, I believe, of justifying national banks in refusing to pay checks to an unlimited extent.

Mr. McMillin. Any one creditor, however, notwithstanding the action of the Comptroller, could close a bank for failure to pay his checks.

Mr. BOATNER. Of course any one creditor who saw fit could have invoked the most rigorous measures against any bank that refused to pay his checks, and the fact that that was not done is the strongest proof that they all felt it was in the public interest that the banks should pursue the course they did pursue; and it was because the liquidation of national banks, the supervision of was because the inquidation of national banks, the supervision of them and the settlement of their affairs in the event of failure, are so fully and amply provided for by the general laws, that they were excepted from the provisions of this act; and I supposed no one knew that any better than the gentlemen who have assuled the bill, indirectly it may be, because of the fact that national banks are not included in its provisions.

Now, the gentleman finds that the fees of the lawyers who are employed to liquidate and conduct the business of a bankrupt estate in court are to be paid out of the assets of the estate. is, that creditors are required to pay their lawyer with their own money.

Gentlemen seem to forget the fact that when a man is a bank-rupt, when his property has been surrendered to his trustee or rupt, when his property has been surrendered to his trustee or assignee, that property then becomes the property of the creditors and that they alone are interested in it. His very adjudication in bankruptcy is a declaration of his insolvency, is a declaration that his property is insufficient*to pay his debts, and when the law provides that the fees of counsel employed to liquidate the affairs of the bankrupt estate shall be paid out of the proceeds of the property, it merely provides that the creditors shall, pro rata, contribute to the necessary expenses of the liquidation of an estate in which they are interested.

Now, the gentleman's next object of attack is the provision relative to homestead exemption; and he undertades to make a legal quibble over the language of the act, undertakes to make it appear that a man might be adjudicated a bankrupt in one State whose domicile was in another, and that by the law declaring that the exemptions, recognized by the laws of the State where the adjudication was made, shall be respected, he not having any exemptions there, would be defrauded of his exemptions in his own State.

It is a sufficient answer to that to state that the member having this bill in charge [Mr. OATES] immediately replied that if any such construction could be put upon the law—and by no fair rule of interpretation could such construction be put upon it he was ready to accept an amendment which would most com-pletely recognize the homestead exemption of the party in the State of his residence.

And I can say to gentlemen who attack the bill upon that ground that we would be just as far from advocating any measure which would imperil the exemptions and homestead laws of the several States as they themselves would be; and if there is anything in this bill which, by any sort of construction, can be held to mean what the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENSON] says it does, we are ready to accept an amendment which will remedy that.

Now, Mr. Chairman, stripped of all verbiage, taking away all

Now, Mr. Chairman, stripped of an verbiage, taking away an questions of sentiment and of passion, striking out all vituperation and epithets, what is this bill?

It is a simple proposition that those who find themselves incumbered with debts more than they can pay, may come into court and surrender what property they have, and be exonerated from their debts. Secondly, that all those who are insolvent and who have committed acts fraudulent or quasi-fraudulent, are liable to be proceeded against in the ordinary method, and after a fair trial before an impartial jury, and to be adjudged bankrupts.

Those are the main objects of the law. The first one is purely humanitarian. It is in the interest of the debtor class. It is also in the interest of the public, because it will enable men whose energies are cramped by a load of debt which they are unable to discharge to again embark in business and add their quota to general prosperity.

The second object is to protect the mercantile interests of the country against the fraudulent failures, the collusive suits, and the schemes which are being continually concocted by dishonest debtors to defraud their creditors. That is what it is; and it is astonishing, sir, that so many champions should arise here for men, all of whom, under the terms of this law, are dishonest; because I say that no honest man can be hurt under any of the most stringent provisions of the law; and if there is any provision of this law under which an honest man can be injured, whether he is solvent or insolvent, further than that his property may be subjected to the payment of his debts, I would like some opponent of the bill to rise in his place and point it out

Mr. BAILEY. Did not the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER] introduce a bill omitting several of the grounds which this bill contains?

Mr. BOATNER. I did.
Mr. BOATNER. I did.
Mr. BAILEY. Then why did you omit them? and by omitting them did you not admit that they are objectionable?
Mr. BOATNER. I omitted them because I considered that they were unnecessary. I consider them unnecessary now, and shall move to amend the bill in those particulars; but that does not take away anything from the force of the assertions which I made just now, and which the gentleman from Texas does not contradict, that there is no provision in this bill under which made just now, and which the gentleman from Texas does not contradict, that there is no provision in this bill under which any possible penalty could be visited upon an honest man.

Mr. BAILEY. I submit to the gentleman from Louisiana that a perfectly honest man may make a perfectly honest assignment, and yet, under the provisions of this bill, he could be made a bankrupt. Do you deny that?

Mr. BOATNER. I do not deny that.

Mr. BOATNER. That is he might be adjudged a bankrupt, on his own application, or that of his creditors under certain circumstances.

circumstance

Mr. BAILEY. But you say he could not be made a bankrupt under this bill.

Mr. BOATNER. I did not say that. Mr. BAILEY. Then I misunderstood the gentleman. Mr. BOATNER. I said he could not be made subject Mr. BOATNER. I said he could not be made subject to any penalties of this bill. It does not strike at any honest man, whether he be solvent or insolvent

Mr. BAILEY. I did not say it could be made a crime under

Mr. BOATNER. If an honest man has made a full surrender of his property, and if he has complied with that provision of the law which requires that he shall faithfully deliver up his property, furnish a list of his creditors and debtors, then he is done. There are no pains and penalties in the law for-him. He is relieved, his debts are discharged. It is the man who has committed what the gentleman from Texas can not deny is a crime or a quasi crime who is subject to the penalties of the law, and who finds himself within its clutches.

Mr. BAILEY. If the gentleman will permit me, as he has referred to me, and challenged me to produce that portion of the law, I say if a man makes an assignment with a preference, under this bill, that while he can not be prosecuted under this bill as a criminal, yet he is put under its penalties. It has been held in every court where the case has been submitted that a man may make a preference in assignment, and still for doing that he is denied his discharge.

Mr. BOATNER. Will the gentleman show me wherein, under this bill, a man may be prosecuted as a criminal for making a preference that he is permitted to make under the laws of the

Mr. BAILEY.

Mr. BAILEY. Yes, sir; I will. Mr. BOATNER. I will be very much obliged to the gentle-

Mr. BAILEY (reading):

Given a preference as herein defined, under an assignment for the benefit of creditors or otherwise which has not been surrendered to the trustee.

Mr. BOATNER. Where is that? Mr. BAILEY. You will find that on page 15, subdivision 2. Mr. BOATNER. The gentleman does not suppose that is a penalty

Mr. OATES.

Mr. OATES. It is a cause of bankruptcy. Mr. BAILEY. For this he is refused his discharge. Is that not a penalty and punishment?

Mr. BOATNER. Please call my attention to the place where you find that again.

Mr. BAILEY. It is on page 15, and it is on line 15.

Mr. BOATNER. You are referring to that part of the bill that refers to the discharge of the bankrupt?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes, sir. In other words, you can make him a bankrupt for having done a thing and then refuse him a discharge.
Mr. BOATNER. You refer to line 24.

Mr. BAILEY. No; I refer to the second subdivision, on line

Mr. BOATNER. On page 15, line 22.
Mr. BAILEY. No; page 15, line 15, subdivision 2. It gives the offenses for which he shall not be discharged, and begins: Committed an offense punishable by imprisonment or fine, as herein pro-

And then beginning on line 15, page 15, with (2) it proceeds as I have instanced a moment ago.

Mr. BOATNER. It states give preference "as herein defined.

Mr. BAILEY. And the preference is not defined.
Mr. BOATNER. I do not find it Mr. BOATNER. I do not find it. In reference to that it is sufficient to say that the section to which the gentleman calls my attention refers to an unlawful and fraudulent preference, which is a quasi offense, and which no honest man can make.

Mr. BAILEY. Not merely a fraudulent preference; any preference. A preference may be entirely lawful under the laws of the State yet it is covered by this provision. Mr. BOATNER. I do not find at this moment the definition of "preference" in the bill. It says "as herein defined," but I of "preference" in the definition.

do not find the definition.
Mr. BAILEY. "Preference," as defined in the bill is the common law definition. In other words, preference there means any

Mr. BOATNER. I will come back to that point later, but I say now that that is no penalty, because it leaves the man in exactly the same condition that he would be left in by the laws of his State. His property is subjected to the payment of his debts, and he is still held liable for the balance, if any. He is left in exactly the condition of any constituent of the gentleman from Texas whose property is seized and sold to satisfy a judgment for more than the property brings.

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman declared that there was no penalty, no punishment provided in this bill, and I was simply contradicting that statement. Mr. OATES. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Louisiand that wherever the bill speaks of a preference, there can be no penaly in law attached to that preference unless it is a fraud-lent one. Every lawyer ought to know that.

Mr. BAILEY. I beg the gentleman's pardon. Many of the States declare any preference untawful, while at the common law a debtor could prefer any creditor.

Mr. OATES. Can the gentleman find any court that will punish a man for making a preference unless it is fraudulent?

Mr. BAILEY. I undertake to say that no court in this Union, unless there be a special statute, can punish a man for making even a fraudulent preference.

Mr. OATES. Well, this bill, when it refers to "preference," means a fraudulent one and nothing else.

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] does not help the gentleman from Louisiana much. [Laughter.] Mr. OATES. Certainly. If there is no definition in the bill of what it means by "preference," then the word takes its com-mon law signification.

Mr. BAILEY. Why don't you say "fraudulent" if you do not intend to cover them all?

Mr. OATES. The law says it.

Mr. BAILEY. The law does not say it; and the gentleman from Alabama will not stand up here and affirm before a body composed largely of lawyers that every preference is fraudulent. Mr. OATES. I did not say that. I said that no preference, unless it was fraudulent, would be punished by the criminal law, and I reassert that proposition. Does the gentleman assert the

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly not; but even a fraudulent prefer-

Mr. DATES. Certainly not, but even a fraudulent preference is not punishable at common law.

Mr. OATES. The question arose in this way. The gentleman said that by this bill a preference was dealt with criminally, but that the word "preference" was not defined in the bill. I remarked that if it was not defined in the bill, then it bill. I remarked that if it was not defined in the bill, then it must bear its ordinary legal interpretation, and that to make a preference punishable by law it must be fraudulent.

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] was otherwise occupied at the time, and the point of my criticism escaped him. I beg the pardon of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER] for interrupting him, but he invited it.

Mr. BOATNER. Of course I did, and I think the gentleman has utterly failed to show any provision of this bill which can be construed as a penalty, or even as a disadvantage in the nature of a penalty, upon any honest man.

Now, sir, I do not apprehend that we can by any law of the United States put a man at a disadvantage for the commission of any act which is lawful by the laws of his State. I suppose it is lawful by the laws of give a preference to a creditor. If a man has made an assignment or a preference under the law of Texas, that assignment must stand; what was lawful at the date of its commission can not be made unlawful by the subsequent act of anybody whatever. Therefore, by the pure force of reasoning the provision of this bill to which the gentle-man calls attention must refer to that class of preferences which ought to be denounced by the laws of the State as unlawful or otherwise fraudulent.

For example, the law of Louisiana allows a man to mortgage his property whenever he chooses, but it also declares that any mortgage which is executed within four months of his failure shall be deemed to be fraudulent. By the mere fact of its being executed within four months of his failure that mortgage is deemed fraudulent and it carries no lien with it. So the bill declares that all preferences which are made within four months of the proceeding in bankruptcy, if the debtor making them shall be insolvent at the time, shall be deemed fraudulent and shall be set aside, and that is the class of preferences referred to in the provision to which the gentleman calls attention.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. If the gentleman from Louisiana will permit me, I wish to suggest, that under the Constitution of the United States Congress may pass a uniform bankruptcy law, and wherever that law conflicted with the State law the State law would necessarily give way.

Mr. BOATNER. Yes; the State law would necessarily give way, but I do not consider that we could by a bankruptey law abrogate the laws of the State which relate to the ordinary contracts between citizens of the State, or between citizens of that State and of any other State. Congress may, in adopting a bankrupt law, deal with the question of insolvency in all its aspects, and any laws of the State dealing with the same subject are abrogated or suspended during the existence of that law.

Mr. KILGORE. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. BOATNER. With pleasure.

Mr. KILGORE. As I understand the gentleman, when a man goes into bankruptcy under the proceeding here contemplated, any mortgage executed or lien acquired within the preceding any mortgage executed or hen acquired within the preceding four months becomes null and void. Now, suppose that within the period of four months, immediately prior to the bakruptcy proceeding, a mortgage has been executed, judgment obtained, execution levied, the proverty sold, money collected and paid, the whole transaction completed, how would this bill affect that sort of a transaction? Would it not be entirely unsettled? Would at the whole transaction of the more discounted that who would be a transaction. not the whole proceeding under that mortgage or lien have to be commenced anew?

Mr. BOATNER. The gentleman states an extreme case; I should consider it prima facis fraudulent, collusive, and out of the ordinary course of business. If an unlawful preference, under the terms of the bill it would be avoided; otherwise not. I find in section 60 the definition given by this bill to "preference," upon which the gentleman from Texas laid such stress a while ago. The language is this:

A person shall be deemed to have given a preference if, being insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency or bankruptcy, he has procured or suffered a judgment to be entered against himself in favor of any person, or made a transfer of any of his property with intent to (1) defeat the operation of this act; or (2) enable any one of his creditors to obtain a greater percentage of his debt than any other of such creditors of the same class.

In other words, in contemplation of insolvency, in contemplation of his failure, the debter suffers this thing to be done; and such conduct the gentleman from Texas seems to consider that of an honestman

Mr. BAILEY. Does the gentleman deny it?
Mr. BOATNER. The gentleman will allow me to say that his ideas on that subject may be very different from mine, because I was bred under the civil law which declares that the property of the debtor is the common pledge of his creditors, and that any disposition made of it by him, when in a condition and that any disposition made of it by film, when in a condition of insolvency, to their prejudice, giving one creditor advantage over another (of course this does not refer to liens, mortgages, or preferences given at a time when the debtor was not in a state of insolvency, is a fraud and may be avoided by the mere fact of insolvency. The gentleman's ideas in view of the code of laws and a which he was raised may differ materially from his under which he was raised may differ materially from mine on a question of that kind, I having been brought up, as I have stated, under the civil law.

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman's explanation is satisfactory to me, although I say to him, he having been "bred under the civil law," that I once saw a distinction drawn between the civil and the common law; the common law being defined as "the perfection of common sense," and the civil law as "the perfection of nonsense." I do not undertake, however, to say that that definition was an accurate one. But the gentleman from Louisians will not deny (because he is too good a lawyer in the civil law not to have a knowledge of the common law) that the the civil law not to have a knowledge of the common law) that the definition of a preference as given in this bill is precisely the common law definition, because any man in making an assignment to a creditor prefers that that creditor shall enjoy a dividend from his estate greater than other creditors.

Mr. BOATNER. But the preference must be made in contemplation of bankruptcy.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, people never make an assignment except in contemplation of insolvency.

Mr. BOATNER. The gentleman's views of what would be the duty of an honest man under those circumstances differ so radi-cally from mine that we can not reach an agreement. I consider that when an insolvent debtor, in view of his failure, in view of his bankruptcy, undertakes to convey his property to one debtor or one class of debtors to the prejudice of other debt-ors who have equal right to be paid, who have equal claims upon his property, he commits a dishonest act, an act which ought to be reprobated, an act which ought to be prevented by a law of the United States which proposes to regulate commercial transactions of this sort in the commerce between States.

Mr. BAILEY. If the gentleman from Louisiana will permit me to put an instance, I am perfectly sure his sense of justice will respond to my view of the case. He says that all debtors ought to be equally paid. Now, suppose the gentleman is indebted to a widow who has placed in his hands every dollar that she possessed in the world; suppose at the same time he is indebted to a rich man who could afford to less the debt without the last a rich man who could afford to lose the debt without the least inconvenience. Now, suppose the gentleman could not pay both those creditors, would he not prefer to pay the widow and let the rich man wait?

Mr. BOATNER. I might do so.

Mr. BAILEY. Yet, under this bill, in doing so you would commit an act of bankruptey.

Mr. BOATNER. I challenge the gentleman to show it. The bill does not so declare.

Mr. BAILEY. Let me finish my statement.

Mr. BOATNER. I am replying to the gentleman. The bill says that if he does that in contemplation of bankruptcy he can

mr. BOATNER. But as to making the act a penal offense or visiting upon the debtor any other penalty than holding him still libble about the statement. liable for that debt, there is no provision in the bill tending to have that effect.

have that effect.

Mr. BAILEY. It is easy to answer a man by interrupting him when he is only halfway through—when he is in the middle of a statement. I contend that when a man does the act which I have described, you under this bill permit the rich man to drag him into court, to make him a bankrupt against his will, and, after having made him a bankrupt, you refuse him a discharge, and compel the widow to return her payment to the court and divide it with the rich man.

Mr. BOATNER. Now, if the gentleman from Texas will kindly permit an interruption. [Laughter.]

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman knows that he invited this himself. I sat here and did not interrupt by a word until he himself invited it.

Mr. BOATNER. I believe the law of Texas, which is largely

Mr. BOATNER. I believe the law of Texas, which is largely borrowed from the civil law, although it is but the perfection of Mr. BAILEY (interpting). We have improved it very much since we adopted it.

Mr. BOATNER (continuing). Probably. I believe under the law of Texas a man who owes debts may be sued. In other words, he may be dragged into court, and there he may be arraigned before a judge and jury, and, from the standpoint of some gentle-men, he may be harshly and mercilessly treated, and all of that in the interest of the creditor. If the debt is proved the complainant may obtain judgment, and when he gets his judgment he may take out a writ of fi. fa. and seize anything that the Texas debtor has that is not covered by the legal exemptions and sell it under the sheriff's hammer and apply the proceeds to his debt, as far as it will go, and if it does not cover the whole of it he can hold the balance of the debt not paid by the proceeds of the property over the head of the debtor. Now, that is the terrible condition of the Texas laws, and so, also, that is the condition of the Texas laws, and so, also, that is the condition of several other States in the Union. Let us see how that compares and comports with this "outrageous piece of legislation" we have now under consideration. Why, the Texas debtor owes a rich man, my collection from Texas for instance, and at the same time he owes a debt to a poor widow, and makes a preference in behalf of the widow and pays her, and he does that knowing the result, but he takes the con-sequences. In the first place, let me say, he has got no business to be largely in debt to a poor widow; but whatever it is. he pays the debt and takes the chances. He has got a perfect right to pay her. He knows that and he does. What is the penalty? The rich man, the heartless creditor, instead of proceeding under the laws of Texas, prefers to take proceedings in the bankruptcy court, and has the debtor adjudged to be a bankrupt and takes all of hisprope ty except what he is entitled to under the legal exemptions. sells the property, applies the proceeds to the debt, and holds the balance on his Texas debtor who has an exemption, which, as I understand the law of the State, covers everything that can be put on a 200-acre lot. Where is the penalty? He is placed in precisely the same position that law places him.

Mr. BAILEY. But the amount paid to the widow may be taken into consideration. Proceedings may be had to recover

Mr. BOATNER. The widow is not in it, so to speak. No; she has got her money and gone, and your Texas debtor is in exactly the same condition that he would be in if his debt had been collected through the ordinary machinery of the county court. Now, to proceed, Mr. Chairman. I will call the attention of the committee particularly to the argument made by my distinguished friend from Texas [Mr. Kilgore] on yesterday, upon the provision of this bill that authorizes the revocation of a discharge that has been procured by perjury or fraud. That seems to be a startling innovation to the gentleman from Texas, that a judicial decree obtained by fraud or perjury should be subject to revision or to be revoked. I believe this is a new feature in bankruptcy legislation, but I take it to be a wise and a beneficial feature. It takes away the incentive to fraud and the inducement to perjury, because the bankrupt who goes into the court and obtains his discharge by such means as that, feels all the time that it is subject to review and that he may be deprived of the fruits of his crime. But the gentleman from Texas was so unreasonably opposed to the law that he overlooked the provision which restricts the right to sue for the revocation of a discharge to those who have an interest in the question, and who have not been guilty of undue laches.

Mr. KILGORE. The gentleman must know that that is not a fair statement.

Mr. BOATNER (continuing). He contended that it was not necessary for a man to be a creditor to have interest in the proceedings in order to enable him to go into the court and allege that the decree granting the discharge of the bankrupt was obtained through perjury or fraud and obtain its revocation. And, Mr. Chairman, the section of the bill immediately below the one the gentleman commented upon plainly and in express terms restricted the right to a creditor, a party having a lawful interest to protect.

Mr. KILGORE. I submit to my friend from Louisiana that that is a very unfair statement. I made the statement the gen-tleman says I made, but corrected it immediately. I recurred to the paragraph and corrected it instantly, and read the section to which he refers making the correction in the presence of the committee: Now, for him to say I insisted that that was the ground of my opposition is unfair and unreasonable. Mr. BOATNER. I certainly do not undertake to say that that was the sole ground of the gentleman's opposition.

Mr. KILGORE. The question I wish to put to the gentleman is this: I did not suppose that any gentleman would reiterate a me for a moment. When we had the debate on the bill on yesterday I inquired, while the gentleman was discussing it, and when he made the assertion I have referred to, whether there was any provision in the bill which required that the application

Mr. KILGORE. And I responded at once—
Mr. BOATNER. Let me go on. The gentleman said "No."
"Well,"said I, "is not the gentleman aware of the universal rule of law, which restricts the bringing of suits to those who have some interest in their prosecution?" and the gentleman replied, "Well that may be the general rule of law, but this bill seems to supersede all the rules of law upon this question.

It was after that that the gentleman ascertained that the pro-vision was in the bill to which I have called his attention; but if the gentleman thinks that the reference to it is unfair, I am perfeetly willing to withdraw it: because I certainly have no disposition to do any injustice to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. KILGORE. The gentleman himself disclosed his own ignorance of his own bill by not being able to call my attention to the fact that it was provided that somebody in interest should make this motion; and as soon as my attention was called to it, that some party in interest must make this motion, I read the section and made the correction, and took back all the misstatements that I have made about it, in the presence of this House.

Now, the question I propose to submit to my friend this morning, in connection with this discussion, is this: I say that on a motion by any man who may feel that he is justified in making the motion, the man who has been discharged from bankruptcy can be put back into bankruptcy after he has been out twenty-three months and twenty-five days; and if there is no ground for it, and if he is acquitted on that trial, yet he is put back into the bankruptcy court and broken up again, though he may be acquitted.

But that is not the main proposition. The most obnoxious feature in it is that he can be convicted of having secured his discharge by fraud, if the proof shows that he committed perjury, or that anybody in his behalf committed perjury in the original proceedings. That is the most obnoxious feature in the whole transaction, and the gentleman seems inclined to dodge that

Mr. BOATNER. Well, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILGORE], I observe, has withheld his remarks of yesterday from the RECORD, and he will therefore have an opportunity to modify his views upon this obnexious paragraph; but the point which he now makes was fully answered yesterday in the questions propounded to him while he occupied the floor.

The gentleman admitted that he did not think a discharge which was procured by fraud or perjury ought to stand. I asked the gentleman that question. I said: "Do you think that a dis-charge that confessedly has been obtained by fraud or perjury charge that confessedly has been obtained by truck. So that ought to stand?" He said he did not think it ought. So that ought to settle the question, so far as he is concerned.

does not propose to revoke a discharge on any other ground. Now, a quibble was attempted to be made on the fact that the law says where a discharge has been obtained by fraud or perjury of a party, or any witness in his behalf; that if any witness had sworn falsely without the connivance, or consent, or knowl-edge of the bankrupt, yet that that would be a ground for setting aside his discharge.

Not so at all. This law is to be construed and enforced by enlightened judges, acquainted with the rules of law. The gentleman knows that if he makes a motion for a new trial on the ground that perjury has been committed on the former trial, he must not only allege the commission of the perjury, but he must also allege and show that the perjury related to a material matter at issue, and that without that perjury the verdict or judgment would not have been given, and that with that perjury eliminated from the record the judgment ought to be

So in this case, if a witness is put upon the stand by the bankrupt, who swears falsely to an immaterial matter, to a matter which would not affect a discharge, which would not affect the judgment and decree of the court, why, the discharge would stand; but, if it was with respect to a matter visceral to the issue, if it was with respect to a matter without which the judge would not have granted the discharge and the creditors would not have consented to it, does the gentleman, from his seat in this body, say that that discharge ought to stand? I believe that as a man and a Representative he certainly will not say so.

But what is the effect of it? It merely puts the man back into bankruptcy. The referee or trustee, or whatever he is called, takes possession of the property. The bankrupt is required to take out a schedule of the property he has, which is subject first to the payment of the debts which he has bona fide contracted since the discharge, and the balance, whatever it may be, is ap-plied to the payment of his other debts. Is there any wrong in that? Is there any reason why a man should reap the fruits of his own perjury or his own fraud? Shall we frame laws here which will hold out an inducement to men to commit fraud, and say to them, "If you can successfully perpetrate a fraud upon the courts, you shall go scot free, and you shall have the fruit of your fraud, and it will not be in the power of the court to take that away from you?"

I think, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Texas in his

I think, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Texas in his calmer moments would not maintain such a proposition before this House.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. BAILEY. I ask that the gentleman be permitted to conclude his remarks.

There was no objection.
Mr. BOATNER. Now, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion I want to say that to the best of my judgment, and according to the judgment of my constituents—and I believe I am as careful of the interests of my constituents as the average member; I believe I am as regardful of my duty as a member as the average member—according to the best of my light I think this bill, with certain amendments, which will be suggested hereafter, and which I think and believe the committee will accept, it is a wise and beneficent measure.

I wish to say of the much-maligned bankruptcy law of 1867, that it came to the country where I live as a white-winged messenger of peace; that it prevented many a family from being thrown into the road and into the street. It released many a man, aye, thousands of them, from a burden of debt which they never could have paid. It took away from the country an incubus of antebellum indebtedness which was crushing it into the earth, and enabled the people to go forward to a period of omparative prosperity.

It may have been unfairly administered, and I think, perhaps, it was; and it did not sufficiently guard the interests of the creditor in the property which was surrendered by bankrupt debtors; that it allowed too much discretion to the judge and the officers; but so far as debtor was concerned, who went into the court and said, "Take what I have and turn me loose," it was a great blessing. I say it was the greatest boon that has befallen the State which I have the honor to represent in part since the war; and at this time, when the people are staggering under a load of debts which have accumulated in the last three or four years of depression, brought about by the low price of their products, to authorize all of those who are more heavily loaded than they can bear, whether merchants or farmers, to go into court and make an honest and fair surrender of the property and take a fresh start, would be beneficent to them and conductve to the public welfare. I do not think the gentleman from Texas, or any other gentleman, can have any reasonable objection to such a law.

It is impossible that the law can operate any hardship upon the farming class, because they are not subject to the involuntary features of it. This property, in most instances, consists of restate and things of permanent value. They are easily accessible by the ordinary processes of law. Their creditors are local creditors who will wait and extend time to them, and there is no necessity that they should be subject to the involuntary class of the act. It will be a boon to many a man who has for years been struggling under a load of debt, more than he could carry, and will enable him to avail himself of its beneficent provisions and to say to his creditors, "Take what I have and give me a release."

Then with respect to the merchant, whom gentlemen have been so vigorously championing. So far as I have heard, either by the public press, by petition or memorial, no opposition has been shown as coming from them against this bill, except the great traders who are in the habit of colluding with fraudulent debtors and defrauding other creditors. Here I want to touch upon a question which has, to some extent, come under my personal observation. It frequently occurs that when a wealthy house finds that one of its customers is getting into financial rouble it arranges to attach his stock of goods.

It is all understood beforehand. The attachment is to run, the big house buys the property, and the other creditors get nothing. The big house is paid, and all the balance of the debtor's creditors get nothing except experience and the pleasure of paying the cost and expense of their vain effort to recover a modicum of what is due. It is from that class of houses, which, by their ability and willingness to assist the fradulent debtor with the means to consummate his plans and resume business in another name that opposition to this bill arises—I do not mean in this House, but from the outside—because I say, sir, that they are the only class of the mercantile community against which this bill will operate injuriously.

The ordinary merchant, the fair dealer, will be benefited by it. Because the merchants all over the country know if it becomes a law that the benefit of a collusion in attachment can not be obtained. If a writ of attachment should be sued out it would be easy to avoid the effects of any collusion or fraud between the parties, by instituting proceedings in bankruptcy. If it appeared that the debtor had committed an act which would justify an attachment, the same evidence would sustain the proceeding in bankruptcy and the property of the debtor, administered for the benefit of all creditors.

the benefit of all creditors.

Then, sir, it not only takes away the incentive from the creditor who would "run" a collusive attachment by depriving him of the advantage which would follow from it, but it also prevents any creditor from taking an attachment unnecessarily or without due consideration and deliberation, because the immediate effect would be to put his debtor into bankruptcy. So that in neither case would the creditor derive benefit from an unnecessary proceeding.

Again, it offers the means to every debtor who has got into insolvent circumstances and is unable to meet his paper, to go into court with a proposition for a composition. He may file his application to be adjudged a bankrupt, and, at a meeting of his creditors he may offer a composition which, if the majority of the creditors in number and amount accept, the court must or ought to accept, and the business is closed. It takes away the power and ability of one recalcitrant creditor to take from the debtor the benefit of the law by demanding more than his share, because it puts all the creditors on an equality, brings them together and affords the means of affecting a fair, equitable, lawful settlement of the affairs of the bankrupt.

Taking it all around, therefore, considering it in every possible

Taking it all around, therefore, considering it in every possible aspect, I do not see how it can be held to be an engine of oppression, because it proposes nothing except the most ordinary proceedure of law under proper safeguards. It can hurt no one, because it guards every one's rights. It proposes to strike at no man unless he has been doing business in a way that is not recognized by law and is at least quasi criminal. The commercial people of this country want it, and the agricultural people, so far as I know, at least are not opposed to it. I have never heard a word of opposition to it except on the floor of this House. Why, sir, there is a book almost as thick as the one I hold in why hand filled with commendations of this law in its mean recommendations of this law in the mean recommendations of this law in its mean recommendations of this law in the mean recommendations of this law in the mean recommendations of the l

Why, sir, there is a book almost as thick as the one I hold in my hand filled with commendations of this law in its main provisions and with demands by the press of this country, from Maine to California, for the passage of a bankrupt law. There seems to be a universal demand all over the country, in all circles, for the enactment of a fair, just, and uniform bankrupt law, and, yielding to that universal demand, and my judgment being that this bill, with some amendments, may be made to meet substantially the demands of the country, I consider it my duty as a Representative to give it my support.

this bill, with some amendments, may be made to meet substantially the demands of the country, I consider it my duty as a Representative to give it my support. [Applause.]

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman said sometime ago, in relation to a certain case which I put to him of a widow woman and a rich creditor, that under the law of Texas everything could be done that this bill proposes, and he declared that the only effect of giving a preference to the widow would be to leave him still subject to the demands of the rich man. I beg him to inspect on page 51 of this bill the paragraph beginning with line 10 and ending with line 16, which provides that if I give any preference that preference is voidable by the trustee, and he may recover the property from the person to whom it is given. Therefore if I were to give a preference to the widow under this bill not only could the rich creditor put me into the bankrupt court, but my trustee could then sue the widow and compel her to bring that property into court to be divided with the rich man.

but my trustee could then sue the widow and compel her to bring that property into court to be divided with the rich man.

Mr. BOATNER. Just reverse the case. Suppose you had given the preference to the rich man and had "stood off" the widow flaughter!, how would you want the law to be then?

widow [laughter], how would you want the law to be then?
Mr. BAILEY. We always prefer the widows. [Laughter.]
Mr. BOATNER. I did not think the gentleman from Texas would argue that we ought to make legislation here with reference to widows and rich people and poor people. In the eye of the law they stand on the same level. I have no doubt that the gallantry of the gentleman from Texas would in all cases induce him to settle with the widow and probably to pay her more than he owed her [laughter]; but all debtors are not so gallant as the gentleman from Texas, and a case might arise in which a debtor would prefer the rich and powerful creditor. The debtor might be more likely to "stand off" the widow (to use a slang expression of the day) and to "stand in" with the rich creditor, and I think that from the gentleman's point of view this is a very wise provision which would compel the rich creditor to disgorge what he had improperly received and divide it with the poor widow.
[Laughter.]

Mr. KYLE. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this bill, and I propose to proceed in my way to give some of the reasons why I oppose it. I do not think, however, that is made necessary by the arguments which have been made in favor of the bill, to make a speech against it. And by this remark, sir, I do not mean to intimate that the gentlemen who have spoken in support of it are not able, ordinarily, to bring to bear upon any subject they discuss as much ability and as much force as any other gentlemen in this House. I mean to convey this idea, that the bill itself is so entirely indefensible that it is impossible for those gentlemen, with all their capacity to present any reasonable excuse for its passage. [Laughter.]

What is proposed by this measure, sir? What is the purpose of it? What is the controlling idea of this bill which is proposed by the interval of the controlling idea of this bill which is proposed.

to be enacted into law? Who is demanding the passage of such a law as this? All of these are questions that properly enter into the consideration of a measure of this kind. If there was a necessity for the passage of such a law as this we would certainly hear an expression to that effect from some section of this great

In whose interest, I ask, Mr. Chairman, is this measure proposed? It is necessarily a commercial measure. The idea of a bankrupt law never originated among any other class of people than persons engaged in trade. The first bankrupt laws of which we have any account had no application to any other class of people than persons engaged in trade. ple than traders. They grew up among trade people exclusively and were enacted for their benefit.

In the days when the idea of a law of this kind originated there appears to have been as little consideration as in some sections appears to have been as little consideration as in some sections of the country there appears to be to-day for the plain people at large. The object of a law of this kind was to benefit the commercial classes, and if there is any class of people to-day who are to be benefited by the enactment of the bill now before us it is the commercial classes, the wholesale merchants. Mr. Chairman, I represent on this floor an intelligent constituency; and I never heard the subject of an involuntary bankruptcy law discussed among them. But when I came here to Congress one of the first heard the subject of an involuntary bankruptcy law discussed among them. But when I came here to Congress one of the first things brought to my attention was that this country was demanding the passage of a bankrupt law. When gentlemen came to talk to me on the subject I said to them, "I never heard this subject of involuntary bankruptcy mentioned in my district." Now, why is it that a law of this kind is wanted? If it is wanted at all it is desired by the wholesale or city merchants. Why is it that the wholesale merchants of the country ask for it? Mr. Chairman, we might as well be candid and frank about

Mr. Chairman, we might as well be candid and frank about this matter. My answer to that question is, they want it to help them to secure the collection of their debts against the country merchants. If this is not true, it is incumbent upon gentlemen advocating this bill on this floor to stand up here and deny that If this is not true, it is incumbent upon gentlemen proposition, and demonstrate that it is not true. I say it is true. Now, I want to put this question to members of the House: Is the Congress of the United States going to lend itself to this measure because this class of people come and demand it after it has been demonstrated by three failures of a law of this kind that the people of the country at large do not want such an enactment?

I submit that if there is anything to be drawn from the history of this country upon the subject of bankruptcy legislation, it is that the people of the country as a mass do not want a law of this character. What reason have I for making this declaration? The best reason in the world. The people have tried a measure of this kind three times, and each time they have repudiated it. In my judgment when they set the seal of condemnation upon the last harkwart law that evisted in this country, they struck the last bankrupt law that existed in this country, they struck down a better measure than the one now proposed. One more humane, more generous, and more just. And I ask you, if the people of the country would not have a measure of that kind, are you going to put this upon them?

Mr. Chairman, I have not time to review all the provisions of this bill; but I wish to call attention to some of them to show this bill; but I wish to call attention to some of them to show their harshness, their injustice to the class of people whom I represent. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER] argued that the agricultural people of this country can not be affected by this bill.

Mr. BOATNER. Can not be injuriously affected.

Mr. KYLE. "Injuriously affected." Let us accept the gentleman's proposition. The presumption is that he made his argument most favorable to his side of the question. Now, let us take his proposition, that this bill can not be used to the injury of the agricultural people of this country. That is the way he puts it now. puts it now.

Let us see whether that position can be maintained. I say that this bill is in the interests of the wholesale merchants of the country, if in the interest of any class; and I know there is no man who is going to deny that proposition. The gentleman from Louisiana will not deny it, because if he does, he gives his case away. And I apprehend that if we were to strike from this bill the provisions for involuntary bankruptcy it would have no acceptability to the class of people who are now asking its passage. It would be like the play of Hamlet with the Prince of Denmark

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. If the gentleman will allow me a single suggestion, I would like to say that the wholesale houses of this country are not-at least all of them are not-in favor of this bill. The firm of Marshall Field & Co., of Chicago-largest dry goods house in America—has always opposed this bill.

Mr. KYLE. Mr. Chairman, I will conclude what I was stating, and then I will notice what has just been said by the gening, and then I will notice what has just been said by the gentleman from Illinois. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. Boat-Ner] says that the agriculturists can not be injured by this measure. Let us see whether they can or not. Suppose that the merchants who supply some of the country dealers in my part of the country should conclude to invoke the machinery of this bill and put it in operation upon some of the country merchants down in my part of the country, among the men carrying on business in agricultural districts. Gentlemen here know how their business is carried on from year to year. how their business is carried on from year to year. the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER] is a country mer-chant dealing with merchants in the city of New Orleans, Mem-phis, or St. Louis. He obtains credit from them; he supplies the rest of his customers who are farmers engaged in growing cotton, sugar, or other agricultural products, with their supplies through the year. He holds mortgages upon their lands, their homesteads.

In order to create confidence in his mind and make him willing to take the risk of furnishing supplies with which to carry on farming operations, his debtors have mortgaged their estates to him. Suppose a gentleman in this situation has got into such a condition that his property at a cash valuation is not sufficient to pay his debts, and suppose his creditors go and make decla-ration of that fact before a court of bankruptcy and bring him in and administer his estate under a bankruptcy proceeding. What is the result of it? Can not a man's mind run forward and see how disastrously, how seriously, how ruinously the farmers of this country could be affected by it?

Mr. BOATNER. Will you please state how they can be hurt?

Mr. KYLE. I am going to do so. I will give an illustration. My colleague here is carried into court and his estate is there administered. It may be against his will, as I stated awhile ago, that he is sent there. These claims and these accounts, which that he is sent there. These claims and these accounts, which he holds or mortgages, whatever they are, goes into the hands of the assignee, or trustee, as he is called in this bill, and beyond his control, into the hands of the man who has no interest in the agricultural community whatever. What is the consequence of that proceeding? The trustee can not grant any indulgence, as the bankrupt could have done if he had been permitted to go on with his business. The creditor is the only man that he has to consider. He has got the debtor to the bankrupt at a disadvantage. There is nothing for him to do but to foreclose he has to consider. He has got the debtor to the bankrupt at a disadvantage. There is nothing for him to do but to foreclose the mortgage, sell the property to the highest bidder, whatever may be the condition of affairs at the time, and, may be, practically confiscate the estate. While, on the other hand, if this man had been permitted to own and control the mortgages and apply the proceeds to the payment of his own debts, there would have been relief to all parties, and the estate might have more than paid its obligations. That is the way it will hurt the farmer. What is there in this bill that is for the benefit in anyway of the farming community? If there is anything let some gentleman who favors it and who has the ingenuity to demonstrate the fact that it exists, in his speech show it. It can not be done. Mr. BOATNER. If the gentleman will permit me—Mr. KYLE. Please wait until 1 get through—Mr. BOATNER. I do not wish to interrupt the gentleman without his consent, but I understood him to ask a question.

without his consent, but I understood him to ask a question without his consent, but I understood him to ask a question.

Mr. KYLE. I will give you some time if you want to reply to it afterwards. I do not want to be interrupted now.

Now, sir, I wish to call attention to this second ground as fixed by this bill for establishing an act of bankruptey against an individual—the second ground for this summary proceeding. It is not like an ordinary proceeding in court where the party comes in and files his declaration, and the defendant comes in and has his day. This is a summary proceeding like an attachment, only worse than an attachment. But I want to call your attention to the second ground fixed in the bill for issuing proceedings in bankruptey: ceedings in bankruptcy:

Falls ifor thirty days while insolvent to secure the release of any property levied upon under process of law for $500 or over, or if such property is to be sold under such process then until three days before the time fixed for such sale and until a petition is filed.

Now, let us see how that operates. Suppose the debtor, my colleague here, should conclude that I was insolvent, that he had taken a sort of mental inventory of my estate as things exist, and concluded that I was insolvent, and as a matter of fact, owing to the depressed condition of the country just now, my property may not sell for enough to pay all of my debts, he go:s into court on that statement and says "this gentleman owes me this money and can not pay it. His property is insufficient in value to pay his debts," and institutes proceedings in bankruptcy against me.

Why, if you put the property of the people of my district on the block to-day to be sold out, I doubt whether you could sell it for money at all or not, because we have not got the money there. And yet under this bill, if he permits his debts to go unpaid while insolvent—and the definition of insolvency in this bill is being in a condition when his property would not bring enough if sold to pay the debt—if he can not pay, or rather if the property will not pay his debts, under such circumstances he is to be forced into bankruptcy.

Mr. STOCKDALE. And this may be done in the summer

Mr. KYLE. Yes, in the summer season, or at any other time during the last few years, because at one season would have brought about as much distress as at another. I ask if Congress is to pass such a measure as this in the condition we are now in, being confronted with the present situation? And mind you, there is no other legal provision given in the bill, except that which would necessarily be provided by the decree, a cash sale. That is the only way the property is to be sold, according to the terms of the bill. When the court enters a decree and makes an order for the sale of the property it must be for cash. No other kind of an order could be made.

But that is not all, sir. I can not pay my respects to all of this remarkable bill; but I call attention as I pass to these provisions that naturally strike me as being the most flagrant and uncalled for and as the most oppressive and onerous. Another ground of bankruptcy is that debtor has Made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors or filed in court a wristen statement admitting his inability to pay his debts.

Suppose he made an assignment. Suppose he has turned and distributed his property fairly and equitably and justly under the insolvent laws of the State; has given every man his prorata share of his effects; that he has dealt them out fairly and hon-estly; yet under this bill he can be put into bankruptcy. That is the meaning of it, and there can be no other. Suppose he has filed a written statement admitting his inability to pay; he is brought into the bankruptcy court, although this transaction occurred six months prior to the time when the proceedings were instituted, and at the time of the proceedings he may be perfectly solvent.

I know gentlemen puta different interpretation on it; but when you come to consider this act you must take the act itself, and not the opinions of gentiemen who are discussing it.

ade while insolvent a transfer of any of his property.

Suppose at any time within six months prior to instituting proceedings for bankruptcy, my friend here being a merchant, he should sell any of his property, and it could be proven that at any moment within the six months his property could not have been sold at a cash sale for enough to pay his debts—no matter how advantageous the trade might have been to him or his business, he is liable to be put into bankruptcy under this

Mind you the words "while insolvent," according to the dictionary attached to this bill, and which fixes the legal meaning of the word "insolvent," mean that whenever his property—no matter from what causes-sinks in value below a point at which it would bring enough at a cash sale to pay his debts, then he is liable to be put into bankruptcy.

Made while insolvent a transfer of any of his property, or suffered any of it to be taken or levied upon by process of law or otherwise, for the purpose of giving a preference.

Now, Mr. Chairman, here is another idea connected with this bill that I want to speak of briefly. In the State of Mississippi it is admissible for a man to make an assignment and give a preference to some creditor whose claim is regarded of a higher character. I have not examined the statutes of other States, but I

There is a recognized difference in the moral obligation for the payment of debts. Illustrations have been given here; and I submit to you, gentlemen, that there are cases in which, so far as my judgment, my ideas of right and justice and fairness and humanity are concerned, an honest, insolvent debtor may be justified in making a preference to some of his creditors. If that was not true statutes of that sort would not be found upon the statute books of nearly all the States of the Union.

Mr. OATES. Will the gentleman allow me a question right

Mr. KYLE.

Mr. OATES. If preferences are allowed by law, while there are some cases as you say where sentiment would dictate the making of a preference, does it not open the door very wide to fraud, and are not very many more preferences made from other motives than those of mere humanity?

Mr. KYLE. It is possible that the gentleman is right in his conclusions, but it is unreasonable to condemn a custom which seems so universally acceptable among the people of the States cause some one now and then must act rascally.

Now, will the gentleman from Alabama let me put this question to him: Does not the State of Alabama permit preferences?

Mr. OATES. It does not, I am glad to say.

Mr. KYLE. I did not know whether it did or not. My State does, and I submit that in the passage of this bill you strike down from Mississippi, and I think most of the States in the Union. the right to regulate these matters in their own way. I thought the State of Alabama permitted preferences, too.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Let me ask my colleague [Mr. OATES] if he is correct in that statement.
Mr. OATES. Yes; I think I am.

Mr. OATES. 1es, I think I am.
Mr. COBB of Alabama. Preferences are upheld in the courts.
It is true that under certain circumstances the giving of a preference might warrant the beginning of proceedings—
Mr. OATES. If you give one creditor a preference over another for the payment of an existing debt, it may be declared a general assignment.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. But for that purpose only. That is the only point to which I wish to call the attention of my friend.

Mr. OATES. It may be held to be a general assignment, and therefore it is not sustained by the law.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. It is sustained except where other creditors take advantage of it for the purpose of certain legal proceedings under the statute.

Mr. OATES. The statute declares it to be a general assignment if anybody asks it to be made so.

Mr. KYLE. I think the discussion between the gentlemen from Alabama [Mr. OATES and Mr. COBB] has substantially established the fact that there is some sort of a preference recognized there.

Mr. OATES. There is no penal statute against making a preference, but the statute declares that if a preference is made. other creditors may ask that it be considered a general assignment, and the court can so declare it.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. That is all. That is the only purpose to which I wish to call attention. The preference of a creditor in Alabama will be upheld by the court; but if the preference is given to one creditor over another, it may be made the foundation of proceedings in the court to declare a general assignment.

Mr. OATES. It is made a general assignment.
Mr. COBB of Alabama. Not unless a creditor proceeds to have it made so. If no creditor proceeds, it is legal.
Mr. KYLE. It does not make much difference, so far as this discussion is concerned, whether preferences are allowed in Ala-

Mr. OATES. If a man makes a fraudulent conveyance of his property, and no creditor attacks it, it is likely to stand.

Mr. KYLE. I want to call attention to credit

this bill, the ninth ground for instituting proceedings in bank-

(9) Suffered while insolvent an execution for $500 or over, or a number of executions aggregating such amount, against himself to be returned no property found, unless the amount shown to be due by such executions shall be paid before a petition is filed.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is no particular or special objection that occurs to me to this section, except that it is fruitful of no result, and I can not see how it could be. This bill goes on to provide that when a party is put into bankruptcy that his exemption under the laws of the State are set aside to him. The exemptions which he is entitled to under the laws of the State from sale under execution are set aside. They are his. They can not be touched by his creditor. Why? Because the statute exempts them from the payment of his debts.

Well, what good are you going to get by putting a man into bankruptcy when an execution nulla bona has been returned into court, when the officer has said that this man has no property court, when the officer has said that this man has no property over and above his exemptions that are subject to his debts? What good can there be of dragging that man away from his home to a court that may be a hundred miles away and put him into bankruptcy? The only thing that can be gotten out of it is an opportunity to intimidate and oppress the debtor in the hope of squeezing something out of him under the law, which he submits to, if he can possibly raise the means, rather than be put into bankruptcy.

Mr. OATES. In reference to the exempt property that you have alluded to, you might further remark, and I will with your permission state, that the title of the owner is not divested by the adjudication of the property which the State law exempts to him. The title remains with him. The only process is to as-certain the value, and whether he has conformed with the State law or not.

Mr. KYLE. That is true; and if the bill provided otherwise it would be nugatory, I think.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to another matter here that strikes me.

Mr. OATES. It is not a very important matter to this description of men; but he has the advantage of the exercise of the bankruptcy power.

Mr. KYLE. Do you think the Federal court could take away from a man the exemptions that are allowed him under the State

I would not vote for such a law; but it has been Mr. OATES. held in bankrupt cases that the bankruptcy law might provide the exemption. Under this bill it is provided that the State law shall prevail: that the exemptions granted by the State law shall be recognized. While I am up, if my friend will allow me, I do not see but what his argument is a perfectly legitimate one on this question in a general discussion; but it seems to me that he must be aware of the fact that when we come to consider the bill under the five minute rule he will have an opportunity and every other member will, and so far as I can go it shall certainly be a very full one, to offer amendments to each and every one of these provisions which they think are objectionable, and test the sense of the House as to whether it is a proper thing or not.

Mr. KYLE. Certainly; I understand that, and I suppose the House understands it. I expect to avail myself of the privilege, when we come to consider the bill under the five-minute rule, of offering some amendments.

Now, I want to call attention to this matter here. It was re-fered to by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Kilgore] yester-day. That is, section 14 of this bill. After you have put this machinery to work, and you have ground the poor debtor through the mill, you have made him a bankrupt, when his estate has been destroyed or squandered, when his credit has been ruined, and he has been broken down, left moneyless and friendless, as is generally the case with a man without money; after you have accomplished that sort of result with him, and after he has been at work with what little hope, energy, and ambition left him in the effort to repair his broken fortune, and he may have been successful for only two years, in that two years he may have gained something with which to support his wife and children and sustain them, and sustain hope, what does this bill provide?

Now, Mr. Chairman, in case some creditor who is not satisfied with the result shall happen to learn something which affords some excuse upon which he can predicate his proceedings, he can set aside that discharge from bankruptcy. That is, a creditor who is constantly vigitant in his pursuit of this bankrupt, at last concludes that somebody swore falsely in the proceedings under which the bankruptcy discharge was obtained, and that man can go into court and establish, not that the bankrupt him-self swore falsely, but that somebody in connection with the proceedings swore to some facts which were false, and he is thrown into bankruptcy again.

The effect of this bill is to bring the man back to court, to marshal his assets again, and have another distribution among his creditors. I ask you, gentlemen, if you are prepared to vote for that sort of a proposition, and if it is possible that a bill for that sort of a proposition, and if it is possible that a bill which contains a provision so cruel, so tyrannical, so unjust, can pass this House? Why, sir, the very idea growing out of this provision of the bill destroys all the apparent sympathy that gentlemen have exhibited here when they said that the measure was in the interest of the poor insolvent debtor. You bring him back into court, you marshal his assets, you have a redistribution among his creditors, who are seeking to get his estate into court and to administer upon it before he dies.

I know it was said here yesterday that that view of the case was not correct, but we find here on page 60 this provision, Subdivision "C:"

Whenever a composition shall be set aside or a discharge revoked the trustee shall, upon his appointment and qualification, be vested as herein provided with the title to all of the property of the bankrupt as of the date of the filing of the application for the setting aside of the composition or the revoking of the discharge.

It seems, Mr. Chairman, that those who drafted this bill were afraid that there might not be put upon this extraordinary provision a construction which would bring the estate back into court, so over here on page 60, thirty or forty pages away from where this extraordinary provision first occurs, they put this in to make it doubly sure that the man has got to come back to court and have his estate readministered.

court, and have his estate readministered.

Suppose, now, that upon that reinvestigation his creditors get him back upon a side issue, upon the question as to whe her some witness may not have sworn falsely, and readminister his estate, and then turn him loose again and let him go for twenty-three months more, and then discover that in that proceeding some other witness has sworn falsely, and bring him back again, and readminister his estate again, if he has any left by that time, and so keep him going until, if he ever had any hope or am-bition or any of the elements that secure success among men they will be completely destroyed.

they will be completely destroyed.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] said that the merchants were not demanding this measure. If it is admitted that the wholesale merchants of this country do not want this bill, then we had better go out of court, because there is no one here to represent the plaintiff in these proceedings, and the case should be dismissed for want of prosecution.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, if I may interrupt the gentleman for a moment; here is the statute of Alabama:

Every general assignment made by a debtor by which a preference or priority of payment is given to one or more creditors over the remaining creditors of the grantor shall be and inure to the benefit of the creditors of the grantor equally.

So, it will be seen that in Alabama a man may prefer a cred-

So, it will be seen that in Alabama a man may prefer a creditor at will, but if he attempts to make a general assignment and by that to prefer a creditor then the preference inures to the benefit of all the creditors. So far, then, the broad statement of my colleague [Mr. OATES] is not correct.

Mr. KYLE. Mr. Chairman, when the gentleman from Alabama interrupted me I was saying that if the statement of the gentleman from Illinois is correct, that the merchants do not want this law, then there is nobody here pressing for its passage, and if nobody wants it we certainly ought not to pass it.

Now, sir, there are some conditions upon which I would be willing to vote for a bankrupt bill, and to that consideration want to devote a few moments before I take my seat. I think that possibly a bankrupt law which provided for voluntary bank-that possibly a bankrupt law which provided for voluntary bankthat possibly a bankrupt law which provided for voluntary bankruptcy alone might be acceptable. I do not know that there is any necessity for it; I do not know that there is any great demand for it, but I think that sort of a law would be acceptable. Certainly if we are to retain the involuntary provisions of this bill they ought to be guarded more circuitly than they are now. This is a summary sort of a proceeding, an extraordinary proceeding in comparison with the ordinary methods in use in the States for the collection of debts, because, as I said awhile ago, a creditor may go into court, file his petition and bring a man in there and administer his estate for the benefit of his creditors, no matter how unwilling the debtor may be no matter how unwilling the debtor may be.

Now, if this extraordinary remedy is granted to the creditor. certainly some protection ought to be given to the debtor. The creditor ought to be required to execute a bond, and when the proper time comes, I propose to offer an amendment providing that before these proceedings shall be instituted, or contempo raneously with the institution of the proceedings, there shall filed a bond to indemnify the bankrupt for any injury that he may sustain by reason of the wrongful sueing out of these proceedings. It may be said that he gets rid of his indebtedness, and that that is compensation to him. In reply to that suggestion I would say that when you march a man into court under these extraordinary proceedings, you strike down his credit, you strike down his business, you paralyze his interests all along the

Mr. STOCKDALE. He does not want to get rid of his debts

Mr. KYLE. No, he does not want to get rid of his debts in that way. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that most men desire to pay their debts. I look at that proposition in a different way from some of the gentlemen who have discussed this bill. I believe that men generally entertain a desire to discharge their obligations in a fair and manly way.

Again, Mr. Chairman, I believe that this bill, in addition to requiring a bond, ought to provide that the party against whose the proceedings are instituted should be permitted to prove, on the traverse of the allegations set up by the petition, the damages that he has sustained to his business and all necessary exages that he has sustained to his business and all necessary exages. If that is not right, why is it not right? The penses incurred. If that is not right, why is it not right? The man who starts out in this bankruptcy business, who invokes this extraordinary proceeding, why ought not he to be willing to come in and say to the debtor: "I will put up my bond and thus put you upon an equality with me."

Remember, Mr. Chairman, there is a time in the history of the creation of the indebtedness when the creditor has the matter all his own way; at the time the debt is created the creditor has the right to say, "No, sir, I will not extend you credit." He has the advantage then. He can keep himself out of the transaction. And certainly when we come to establish rules by which the creditor is to invoke the strong arm of the law, the same rethe creditor is to invoke the strong arm of the law, the same relations ought to be kept up, if possible, between debtor and creditor that they originally started with. The bond being filed in court, the defendant should be put upon an equality with the creditor, should be permitted to traverse the allegation and prove his damages. If that were done there would not be so much objection to this involuntary portion of the bill.

I say, Mr. Chairman, if we are to have a bankrupt law at all with an involuntary feature in it, it ought to be hedged about in that way; and when this House comes to act upon this measure, endeavoring to establish rules and regulations which will keep men upon an equality in their business transactions and work out fair and honest results, I believe such provisions as I have suggested will be incorporated in this bill.

Mr. Chairman, there is another reason why I am opposed to an involuntary bankrupt law. It not only, as I have tried to demonstrate, affords to the creditor an opportunity to oppress the debtor who is unable to pay, it enables the creditor to oppress a debtor who in all probability would be able to pay every debt he owner it allowed propagations. debt he owes if allowed proper opportunity. I dare say there is not a man listening to me who somewhere along in his experience during life has not seen a time when if his property had been put up and sold it would not have paid his debts at a cash valuation. I appeal to the experience of gentlemen on this floor. Without undertaking to know their condition or history I venture to say that there is not a man listening to me who at some time during his life has not been in such a condition that not have brought enough to have paid his debts. Now, my friends, if any of you were in that sort of a situation, and if a bill of this kind were in force, you could be carried to a bankruptcy court and your estate taken away from you and administered without your having an opportunity to work out of your difficulties, pay your debts and get a discharge like an honest man without being embarrassed with the idea that you have been put through a bankruptcy court. And the result would be the same if at any time within six months the filing of proceedings against you should find yourself in such a condition.

I further oppose this bill, Mr. Chairman, because I do not if his property had been put upon the block to be sold it would think that any practical good can come to any one from having an involuntary bankruptcy law. The estates of insolvent debtors are usually, when administered by a bankrupt court, consumed in expenses. This has been the case so far as my knowledge extends; and I dare say other lawyers here agree with me that this is usually the result. I believe that when you take a man and against his will carry him to a court for the purpose of marshaling there his assets and applying them to the payment of his debts, you ought at least to carry him to a court where he could feel that his creditors, to whom he wants honestly and conscientiously to make payment, would obtain something from his estate.

Now, there are a great many lawyers on this floor; and I want to appeal to the experience they have had in the bankruptcy courts of this country under the administration of the act of 1867. Did you ever know any creditors to get anything out of a man's estate after he had been forced into bankruptcy not see the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER] in his seat; but I have been told that under the act of 1867 they had a court down in his part of the country which administered that law among the people of Louisiana, and in that court no creditor ever gota single cent out of the proceedings at any time. I have heard it stated that the court in the district in which I live made a better showing on that subject than any other court in the Union—distributed a larger dividend among creditors. Yet, speaking from my experience in that court, I can not say that creditors ever received much benefit from it.

submit, then, that when this bill is stripped of its objectionable and oppressive provisions it offers nothing practical in the way of securing to creditors their indebtedness. And I oppose this measure upon this ground among others. I will say, how-ever, in conclusion that in my opinion the only idea upon which a bankruptcy law can be sustained is that it may give to the a bankruptoy law can be sustained is that it may give to the honest insolvent debtor an opportunity to go into some court and get rid of his liabilities so as to enable him to enter the race of life again with the possibility of better success in the future. I will therefore vote for a properly guarded law which provides for voluntary bankruptoy. [Applause.]

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Chairman, in regard to the matters affected by this bill, the situation appears to be about this: Our country embraces in extent thousands of miles. Our citizens are living under the jurisdiction of forty-four different States. By reason of the development of our systems of transportation and communication, every year the business of each member of our commercial community has become more and more a matter of interstate rather than local commerce or business

And yet, sir, with that situation before us, we have so inadequately provided legislation with which to meet it that to-day a creditor in any part of the Union has practically no means of insuring to himself a fair distribution of the assets of his debtor, unless in most cases he shall go to extraordinary expense and trouble. And, on the other hand—and this is a much more serious consideration—an honest debtor, an unfortunate business man in any State of our Union, has no way under heaven by which he can be rid of the incubus of his business misfortune, and must go down to his grave laden by it, except he obtains the mercy of every creditor in all of the States outside of his own. Now, this is an anomalous situation. It is one which, to the extent that it is suffered here, exists, I believe, in no other of vilized country of this world. How did it come about?

ized country of this world. How did it come about?

One hundred years ago our forefathers in adopting the Constitution of these United States absolutely prohibited the States from dealing with this question; and by the same act they took upon themselves, not by inference, but by express provision of the Federal Constitution, the duty of providing laws for the settlement of bankrupt estates. Such is the situation and such is the duty that the Federal Government has promised to perform. It remains unperformed. There are a few great firms whose wealth is an impress, and whose husiness is so extensive that wealth is so immense and whose business is so extensive that they can afford to engage, under a permanent retainer, counsel in every part of the country; and it has become notorious that whenever a business man fails in any part of the country, one of these firms is generally found to be a preferred creditor. On the other hand, the great mass of business men, whose prosper-ity consists in being able to trade in all parts of the country, are forced to adopt the alternative either of closely watching the rumors from every direction, and of rushing in and breaking down any man as to whom they may hear a rumor of insolvency, or, in case they give him the benefit of the doubt, of being subjected to a practical loss of whatever is owing to them from the estate of anybody who is driven into insolvency

Now, sir, as I have suggested, that is a situation that is absolutely intolerable. It is the result of our neglect of the duty which was assumed by the Federal Government one hundred years ago. It is the performance of that long-neglected duty which is now suggested from the Committee on the Judiciary, which in such respects is, as it ought to be, the leader of this

I know, sir, that there are objections to the bill. I have heard it urged as a serious objection that it provides for involuntary as well as voluntary bankruptcy. Mr. Chairman, the duty which our forefathers assumed and which we must perform, unless we wish to violate by omission the Constitution which we have sworn to support, is not a one-sided duty. It did have as one of its aims the discharge of honest debtors who had given up their relations for the heavy their constitutions from the arms of their constitutions. estates for the benefit of their creditors from the onus of obliga-tions of which they had no hope of being rid of otherwise. But on the other hand it involved the duty of securing a fair distribution of the estate of a man whose misfortunes in business had left him no interest whatever in the property over which he still held control, and which should be administered for the benefit of those who have beneficial interests in it. In other words, sir, creditors have rights as well as debtors; and it is to the advantage of debtors as well as of creditors that the rights of both should be subserved by any legislation which we are to

It has been objected, sir—and I mention this more to show the character of the objections to the bill than because I believe it character of the objections to the bill than to discussed at length be-is of any need that the question should be discussed at length be-fore this House—that the mere making of an assignment in insolvency is made by this bill an act of bankruptcy. We are asked to consider how unfair it is to brand as an act of bankruptcy the distributing by a debtor of his property equitably under the laws

Now, so far as concerns property rights, it is not a matter of importance to the debtor who has already put all of his property at the disposal of his creditors. It is not a matter of importance to the creditors if the insolvency proceedings are fair; for they would get just what they would get under the bankruptcy proceedings. But it is a matter of importance to the honest debtor that the proceedings should be carried on under the Federal bankruptcy laws instead of under the local insolvency laws, and this in order that the citizen of States other than his own may have their claims against him forever afterward barred; and so the very point which is seized upon as a basis of criticising the bill is in fact one the object of which is beneficial to the honest debtor.

We are told that former laws proved faulty. So they did. it has not been suggested but that the reasons for their failure are perfectly well known and can be perfectly well provided gainst.

For example, take our last bankrupt law. There is no question but that it was beneficent, in securing to thousands upon thousands of distressed but honest men a chance to start anew in life. There is no question but that in hundreds, aye, in thous nds of cases, the fact that there was a bankrupt act standing upon the books, with the provisions which it contained, did fore-stall the whole question of fraud, and prevented attempts to de-fraud creditors that would otherwise have been made.

It is a fact, however, that the proceedings under that act were so complex that there was some ground for the criticism that it too often used up the whole estate of the bankrupt in the attempt to see that nobody got more than his fair share of it.

But, sir, this bill has not been criticised from that standpoint. I do not believe it is subject to such criticism. I believe that every one who has read it will agree that, as compared with the last law upon the statute book, in that regard it effects a muchneeded reform.

The question, moreover, is not whether we shall pass this law, letter for letter and line for line, as it comes from the committee, but whether it is not our duty here to consider this matter and deal with it in the light of the experience which has been had-in the light of the discussion which we shall be allowed to give to it—and so to frame a bankrupt act that it shall stand as the best expression of this House of the way in which should be performed the duty which has devolved upon us.

I know there have been numerous criticisms made of the details of this act. I will not weary the committee by discussing many of them, most of which have been so ably treated by my colleagues upon this floor in this discussion. I will refer to but one or two of them, one especially as to which I do have some special knowledge.

My colleague from New York [Mr. RAY] called attention to the fact that in clause 5 of section 2, the purchase or sale by a man, when insolvent, of commodities, with intent not to deliver or to receive them, but rather to settle by paying or receiving differences in money, should be an act of insolvency.

Now, I agree with my colleague in his cuittelium of the coll differences in money, should be an act of insolvency.

Now, I agree with my colleague in his criticism of that clause. Of course, I do not believe that it is good business policy for a man, when he has already lost so much money that the little he yet controls does not belong to him, but to somebody else, to speculate upon it; but the law might just as well provide against that man's betting on horse races. If you are going to work on this principle you might just as well provide against his hiring an expensive box at the opera, or against his playing poker at a big limit, or without any limit at all, as to insert that provise in the bill.

But, sir, I can not agree that the clause might be improved by striking out the words "when insolvent." If there is one thing that is more undemocratic and more nonsensical than to attempt to stop gambling by law, in the case of a man who has no money of his own, and who is gambling upon somebody's else money, it is to prohibit gambling by law, when a man is using his own money to do it with.

But, Mr. Chairman, whichever way the section stands, or whether it stands or not, it is immaterial to this bill; for I tell you, sir, after somewhat of experience in litigation concerning such matters, that there never will be a case found where the "intent" named in the bill can be so proved that it will subject any man to bankruptcy. Honest men engaged in "future" dealings, which they expect to carry out, are not subject to this provision, and there never was a speculator or a man who tried to dodge the law from whose heart you could wring proof of the "intent" which will make him subject to a bankruptcy act. So, although I believe, as my friend from New York [Mr. RAY] suggests, that this provision should be stricken out, although I believe it to be absurd to amend it, as certain others have suggested. lieve it to be absurd to amend it, as certain others have suggested; yet, whether it is stricken out or amended, it is comparatively of no importance whatever.

As to other criticisms that have been made upon matters of detail, in a great many cases the good faith of those criticisms has been shown by the presentation of amendments calculated to meet them. In other cases the lack of any suggestion tend-ing to perfect the bill shows, or at least suggests, the animus with which the criticisms are made.

with which the criticisms are made.

For myself, sir, I have gone carefully over the bill, and I am free to own that in a number of cases, had I drawn it, I should have drawn it differently, and I believe I might have suggested some improvements in certain cases. I have conferred, however, with the author of the bill and the distinguished gentlemen, members of the Committee on the Judiciary, in charge of it; and while not convinced in every case, yet I must confess they have convinced me, as to the majority of the cases, that they know what they are doing better than I do, and that they have framed a bill better than I would be able to do, with my present knowledge. I therefore ask this House to stay by this matter until we shall have performed the duty put upon us by the Constitution, until we have remedied the omission in that regard which has become a source of so much embarrassment to our which has become a source of so much embarrassment to our citizens. If the bill needs perfection by amendment, amend it until it is in the shape that most accords with the common sense and the patriotism of this House.

The pledge that there should be a bankruptcy act, and that the Federal Government would provide for this matter, was made more than one hundred years ago, at a time when our country was a narrow strip along its present eastern border, when the States were thinly populated, and so isolated that interstate commerce was not a hundredth part of what it is now, at a time when the lack of such a provision, and the need of such legislation in regard to bankruptcy was not one tithe of what it is at present. Every advancing year has made its performance more urgent; and we ask you now to carry out that pledge.

We ask you to pass a bankruptcy act that shall enable honest debtors to be discharged from obligations which they are no longer able to meet; that shall enable considerate creditors to rest in peace without having to take the alternative either of pressing good men into business ruin or allowing their own in-terests to be sacrificed by the fraud of others. We ask that a bankruptcy act be passed in order that, on the one hand, the hasty greed of the creditor, the overwatchfulness of the man who has trusted another, and on the other the attempt on the part of him who has been trusted to shirk any part of his just obligations shall be alike forestalled by a measure which shall insure equal justice to all.

Mr. BROSIUS. Mr. Chairman, the very forceful address just made to the House by the honorable member from Mississippi [Mr. KYLE] on one side and the equally forceful utterances of my honorable friend from New York [Mr. WARNER] on the other side of this measure, fairly raise the question whether there ought in fact to be any national bankrupt law enacted; whether the principle of such a law is a sound one, and whether the commercial situation of this country requires such a law.

In the observations I shall be able to make I shall neither commend nor condemn the specific provisions of the measure. The examination I have been able to give the bill has been so cursory that I do not feel justified in detaining the House upon a discussion of its details. I desire to make some general ob-

a discussion of its details. I desire to make some general observations, and to present as briefly as I can the broad grounds upon which I think the necessity and propriety of a uniform system of bankruptcy in the United States can be supported.

The constituency which I have the honor to represent is, perhaps, in as little need of the benefits of such a law as any equal number of people in the United States; but the most far and the benefits of such a law as any equal number of people in the United States; but the most far have described as a part to be berned by the operation of a law of vored sections can not be harmed by the operation of a law of this character, while many sections, perhaps the larger portion of the Union, may derive very material benefits from the operation of the law.

PENNSYLVANIA'S ATTITUDE.

If there is any doubt in relation to the attitude of Pennsylvania upon this subject—and it seems there is, unless some of my colleagues from that State have unwittingly misconceived the views of their constituents—I am certain that there is no doubt of the attitude of the body of the people whom i have the honor to represent upon this floor; and I desire briefly to voice those views in favor of a uniform system of bankruptcy in this country. Realizing, as every one does, that a proposition, however sound and entitled to public acceptance, wins its way much more easily into public favor when it enjoys the support and the authority of some great and venerated name, I want to secure that advantage to my propositions by reading a very brief paragraph or two from a very distinguished and eminent judge.

Judge Story some years ago wrote:

One of the most pressing grievances bearing upon commercial, manufacturing, and agricultural interests at the present moment is the total want of a general system of bankruptcy. It is well known that the power has lain dormant, except for a short period, ever since the Constitution was adopted; and the excellent system then put into operation was repealed before it had any fair trial upon grounds generally believed to be wholly beside its merits and from causes more easily understood than deliberately vindicated.

In another paragraph he says:

It can not but be a matter of regret that a power so salutary should have hitherto remained a mere dead letter. It is extraordinary that a commercial nation, spreading its enterprise through the whole world, and possessing such an ininitely varied internal trade, reaching almost to every cottage in the most distant States, should voluntarily surrender up a system which has elsewhere enjoyed such general favor as the best security of reditors against fraud and the best protection of debtors against oppression.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the contention in favor of a national system of bankruptcy enjoys the unusual felicity of having the supportalike of principle, reason, authority, and experience, not even lacking sentiment. The gentleman who describes this bill as a scheme for the extinguishment of the last ray of hope in the breast of despairing debtors, sheds tears that are not due. He misconceives the operation of a bankrupt law and mistakes a blessing for a curse.

A BANKRUPT LAW NECESSARY.

A bankrupt law presents three factors with which we are compelled to deal; the debtor, the creditor, and the commercial publie in their large and broad interests. The law deals with the situation of a debtor unable to pay his debts, having property inadequate, on division, to liquidate his liabilities. Now, the solution of the problem will be found in the answer to the inquiry: In such a situation what is best, alike for debtor, creditor, and the commercial interests of the community?

I doubt if there will be any dissent from the proposition that the very best thing for an honest debtor who has been for years carrying a load of debt from which he has no hope of extricating himself, and who is borne down, discouraged, and disheartened, is to relieve him of his burden and enable him to stand erect once more and feel that he is regenerated, emancipated from everlasting captivity to his debts. He can take a fresh start in business, he can acquire property, light breaks upon his path-way, hope springs again in his breast, and he sees a future before him. Is there a doubt in any mind that that is the best thing to do for an honest debtor thus situated? But, Mr. Chair-man, that blessing can only come from a national bankrupt law. No State can discharge the bankrupt from all his debts. On that point I desire to read a passage from a very eminent statesman of former years. Daniel Webster, in a celebrated speech on the subject of a national bankrupt law in 1840, among other things

I am free to confess my leading object to be to relieve those who are at present bankrupts—hopeless bankrupts, and who can not be discharged or set free but by a bankrupt act passed by Congress. I confess that their case forms the great motive of my conduct. It is their case which has created the general cry for the measure. Not that their interest is opposed to the interest of the oreditors, still less that it is opposed to the general good of the country. On the contrary, I believe that the interest of the creditor would be greatly benefited even by a system of voluntary bankrupty, and I am quite confident that the public good would be eminently promoted. In my judgment all interests concur, and it is the duty to provide for these unfortunate insolvents in a manner thus favorable to all interests which I feel urging me forward on this occasion.

Upon the same subject an eminent jurist, writing in the American Law Register of June, 1865, said:

Should the bankrupt act under consideration become a law it will open to he honest bankrupt freedom from his debts and a new lease of mercantile the honest bankrupt freedom from his debts and a new lease of mercantile life.

The points aimed to be secured by the present bill are the discharge of the honest debtor upon the surrender of his property, protection of the creditor against the frandulent practices and reckless conduct of his debtor. Without such a law creditors may be defrauded of their just debts and debtors become castaways upon the broad ocean of commercial life. To vouchsafe such relief in the community is assuredly the paramount duty of legislation. Under this act the debtor and creditor meet upon the common ground of obligation and duty.

Mr. Chairman, how apropos these observations to this meas-

Mr. RAY. I hope my friend does not intend to lay it down as a legal proposition that no State can pass laws to discharge debtors from their debts?

Mr. BROSIUS. I intend to lay down as a legal proposition, which my learned friend, or any other learned lawyer upon this floor will not think it worth while to dispute at the peril of their reputation, that a State can not discharge a debter from the obligation of his contract, except such contracts as were entered into subsequently to the passage of the law.

Mr. RAY. The State law?

Mr. BROSIUS. Yes, sir; and in no instance can any State discharge any debtor from the obligation of his contract entered into with citizens of another State; thus demonstrating the impossibility of any State enacting an effective bankrupt law. Mr. RAY. That is all true, but—

Mr. BROSIUS. Well, if that is true let it rest there, because I desire to proceed.
Mr. RAY. That is true, but that is not the statement you first made.

Mr. BROSIUS. I did not intend to make any statement. I simply alluded, in passing, to the inability of a State to pass a bankrupt law. The interruption was hardly justified, if my friend will allow me to say so.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in the second place, what is best for the creditors? I do not hositate to affirm that the best thing for the creditors is to have an equitable division of the property of the debtor applied to the payment, ratably, of the unsecured in-debtodness, under such restrictions as will prevent a race among creditors for judgment and execution. We must not forget that debtors sustain equal relations with creditors and are under debtors sustain equal relations with creditors and are under equal obligations to them in a large and general way, and the claims of justice are satisfied when whatever property the debtor possesses is divided and apportioned ratably among them according to their respective claims.

I submit, furthermore, that such an apportionment of the debtor's property exerts a very salutary influence upon the commercial community. It promotes credit and confidence everywhere by promoting an increased feeling of security. Mr. Chairman, I was very much impressed by the remarks of my honorable friend from New York [Mr. Coombs] on yesterday in speaking upon this bill. It was interesting indeed to look into the face of a merchant who had dealt with every people upon the face of the earth and had found them trustworthy. What a fine compliment to the human race! And while the gentleman was dwelling upon the importance and the necessity of this confidence and credit there came to my mind an incident in the history of Charles James Fox that most strikingly illustrates the point upon which he was speaking.

Mr. Fox had laid down before a creditor a sum of money.

The creditor, a merchant, produced his note and said, "Mr. Fox, I want you to pay me my indebtedness out of that money." The English statesman said, "I can not do that, sir; that money must contain the creditor holds no never it is not a pay a dath of honor for which the creditor holds no never it. English statesman said, "I can not do that, sir; that money must go to pay a debt of honor for which the creditor holds no paper." The merchant was profoundly impressed by that exhibition of honor. He looked at his note for a moment and then tore it to pieces, and flinging them at the feet of the statesman said, "Now, sir, mine is a debt of honor also." Mr. Fox was very sensible of the fine compliment; and he said to the merchant, "Here, sir, take the money, yours is the oldest debt; the other man can wait." But, Mr. Chajiman it seems to me that a more way.

But, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that a measure of this kind will also promote facilities for sales by supplying facilities for collection. And let me direct attention to another thing it will do: It will dispense in a large measure with the necessity of creditors becoming sleuthhounds, constantly pursuing their harassed debtor lest some one quicker of scent and swifter of foot may get in anead at the finish. Why, sir, the knowledge that no one or two creditors can get in ahead and sweep away the entire estate, has a very composing and tranquillizing influence upon all. Thus the debtor secures greater indulgence, enjoys better opportunities if he desires them, than when his estate is but the spoil of victory in a race, a stake for which hungry creditors play with the processes of the law for execution.

THE ACTS OF BANKRUPTCY ARE VOLUNTARY.

Objections have been made to that portion of the bill which defines acts of bankruptcy. While that part of the bill may be subject to amendment, as I think it is, it is pertinent to say that every act of bankruptcy named in the bill is a voluntary act on the part of the debtor, an act which he commits of his own voltage. tion, without compulsion; and if he chooses to refrain from the commission of the specified act he is not amenable to the involuntary provisions of the bill. His liability to be brought into court by a petitioning creditor is a matter entirely under his unrestrained control. So long as he obeys the law he enjoys absolute immunity from the compulsory features of the act. It can be nothing more than a voluntary bankrupt law to any debtor who refrains from committing the forbidden acts.

DISHONEST DEBTORS.

Of course if a debtor is dishonest he ought not to be discharged; no man should profit by his own wrong. undertaken to defraud his creditors or has violated any provisions of the law he ought not to enjoy any advantage therefrom. The law of every State or nation ought to encourage and teach honor and honesty-not put a premium upon rascality or permit immunity from the consequences of fraud or wrongdoing. Thus every man knows what are the rewards of honest dealing; and those who do not perceive that virtue is its own reward will at least appreciate the advantages which the law attaches to integrity in commercial dealing. Thus the reflex influence of such a law will be highly salutary upon the commercial community. It will premote commercial rectitude. It offers a premium for integrity and subjects wrongdoing to burdens and penalties. So that for all classes and from all points of view it is obviously the best way of treating debtors, honest or dishonest, each, however, in their own deserved way.

HONEST CREDITORS.

It is just, as well as merciful, to honest creditors to protect them against the practices of debtors who, forgetting their equal obligation to their creditors, seek to give all their property to a favored few. This is permitted, perhaps, by the laws of most of the States on the principle that as long as a man has dominion over his property he can use it to pay any debt he pleases.

THE TIME IS OPPORTUNE.

There is another matter which comes to my mind. It has been said that this particular period, when the country is suffering from business depression and hard times, is inopportune for the application of the principles of a bankrupt law. What a colossal misconception of the relation which a bankrupt law bears to debtor and creditor!

Gentlemen ought to remember, and they doubtless will remember, that the processes of the law are not suspended, relaxed, or intermitted pending a season of hard times. On the contrary, creditors are more vigilant, more alert, and ofttimes more merciless in such seasons than at any other time. Their distrust, their anxiety, their fear of loss, their apprehension lest some other creditor may get in ahead of them in the race, whets their appetite, accelerates their movements, greatly to the distress of

of all the times and conditions of the country the existing situation is most seasonable for this relief. We ought to yield to the solicitations of the prevailing distress, when sheriffs are said to be reaping harvests and debtors are crushed beneath the heels of ricing and contending creditors, and temper the misfortunes of the time with the humane and helpful provisions of a bank rupt law. No circumstances could be more opportune, no situa-tion more inviting. Thousands of honest debtors who for years have been sweating under their burdens now under the added stress of the prevailing depression feel that they are without succor and save. What they need, what they pray for is a law that will lift their load and give them another chance to retrieve that will lift their rotal and give them another enance to retrieve their fortunes and achieve prosperity and happiness. In this connection I can not refrain from quoting the words of Daniel Webster, in the Senate of the United States in 1840, when plead-ing for the passage of a bankrupt law. The urgency was not as great then as now. These are his persuasive words:

great then as now. These are his persuasive words:

Mr. President, let us atone for the omissions of the past by a prompt and efficient discharge of present duty. The demand for this measure is not partial or local. It comes to us earnest and loud from all classes and all quarters. The time is come when we must answer it to our own consciences if we suffer longer delay or postponement. High hopes, high duties, and high responsibilities concentrate themselves on this measure and on this moment. With a power to pase a bankrupt law which no other Legislature in the country possesses, with a power of giving relief to many, doing injustice to none, I again ask every man who hears me if he can content himself without an honest attempt to exercise that power?

We may think it would be better to leave the power with the States; but it was not left with the States; they have it not, and we can not give it to them. It is in our hands, to be exercised by us, or to be forever useless and lifeless. Under these circumstances does not every man's heart tell him that he has aduty to discharge? If the final vote shall be given this day, and if that vote shall leave thousands of their fellow-citizens and their families in hopeless and helpiess distress, to everlasting subjection, to irredeemable debt, can we go to our beds with satisfied consciences? Can we lay our heads upon our pillows and, without self-reproach, supplicate the Almighty Mercy to forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors?

Sir, let us meet the unanimous wishes of the country and proclaim relief to the unfortunate throughout the land. What should hinder? What should stay our hands from this good work? Creditors do not oppose it; they apply for it; debtors solicit it with an importunity, earnestness, and anxiety notto be described; the Constitution enjoins it, and all the considerations of justice, policy, and propriety which are wrapped up in the phrase 'public duty' demand it, as I think, and demand it loudly and imperatively at our hands.

duty' demand it, as I think; and demand it loudly she imperserves, as our hands.

Sir, let us grafify the whole country for once with the joyous clang of chains, joyous because heard failing from the limbs of men. The wisest among those whom I address can desire nothing more beneficial than this measure, or more universally desired; and he who is youngest may not expect to live long enough to see a better opportunity of causing new pleasures and a happiness long untasted to spring up in the hearts of the poor and the humble. How many husbands and fathers are living with hopes which they can not suppress, and yet hardly dare to cherish, for the result of this debate! How many wives and mothers will pass sleepless and feverish nights until they know whether they and their families shall be raised from poverty, despondency, and despair, and restored again to the circles of industrious, independent, and happy life!

Sir, let it be to the homor of Congress that, in these days of political strife and controversy, we have laid aside for once the sin that most easily besets us and, with unanimity of counsel, and with singleness of heart and of purpose, have accomplished for our country one measure of unquestionable good.

A MORAL QUESTION.

Mr. Chairman, there is another matter worthy of consideration. I think that wrapped up in a measure of this character is a great question of commercial morality—a question whose importance to every community can not be overestimated. How many men all over this country are to-day engaged in an unequal struggle with misfortune and adverse circumstances, borne down withaweight of debt which they can never lift, and who ought long ago to have surrendered, not because they are not entirely sensible of their inability to relieve themselves from their burdens by discharging their debts, but because they can derive no advantage from surrendering their property to their creditors, for the unpaid residue remains, and they are then stripped of both property and the possibility of acquiring it in the future. Such a condition of things exerts in any community an influence detrimental to debtor, creditor, and to the commercial community at large.

Mr. Chairman, there is no situation which subjects the truthfulness and the integrity of a man to so severe a test as this longcontinued struggle of a debtor to hold on to his property, to excontinued struggie of a debtor to hold on to his property, to exercise dominion over it, and to avoid the supposed reproach and disgrace of insolvency or bankruptcy. Every observing man, I dare say, has witnessed in his own community instances in which character has yielded by gentle but progressive stages to the solicitations of a false pride on the part of the debtor and the natural disinclination to surrender his property that cost him years of labor to acquire, because the residue of his indebtedness, unpaid, must still linger behind and pull him down. It is a slow process of moral disintegration and it works in this way. a slow process of moral disjutegration, and it works in this wayyou see it so often that it can not have escaped notice:

First, the truth is suppressed to maintain delusive appearances which disarm the vigilance of creditors who might otherwise precipitate a crisis; to preserve the appearance of solveney borrows money from A to pay B; and so he keeps on revolving around the circle, robbing Peter to pay Paul. As the situation increases in intensity, the necessity for deception grows in urgency. It is a short step from truth suppressed to falsehood expressed, and so the process of moral degeneration goes on, the loss to the creditor going hand in hand with the loss of veracity and integrity on the part of the debtor, until the end comes in a twofold ruin. Let me read again from the cogent reasoning of Mr. Webster:

Webster:

But the result is bad every way. It is bad to the public and to the country, which loses the efforts and the industry of so many useful and capable citizens. It is bad to creditors, because there is no security against preferences, no principle of equality, and no encouragement for honest, fair, and seasonable assignments of effects. As to the debtor, however good his intentions or earnest his endeavors, it subdues his spirit and degrades him in his own esteem: and if he attempts anything for the purpose of obtaining food and clothing for his family, he is driven to unworthy shifts and disguises, to the use of other persons' names, to the adoption of the character of agent, and various other contrivances to keep the little earnings of the day from the reach of his creditors. Fathers act in the name of their sons; sons act in the name of their fathers; all constantly exposed to the greatest temptation to misrepresent facts and to evade the law, if creditors should strike All this is evil, unmixed evil. And what is it all for? Of what benefit to anybody? Who likes it? Who wishes it? What class of creditors desire it? What consideration of public good demands it?

PREFERENCES.

The false credit which enables men to continue business long after they are hopelessly and irretrievably insolvent is derived from indorsements of those who take the risk on the promise of being preferred if anything happens. On this appearance of solvency he sails on, catching wind wherever he can, taking on additional liabilities in proportion as he becomes unseaworthy, until the collapse comes, when one or two preferred creditors who supplied the wind that belied his delusive sails are saved and all the rest go down in irretrievable ruin. The tendency of a bankrupt law which stops preferences used as a means to still further inveigle the innocent to their loss will be to halt business careers when overtaken by insolvency, and curtail their opportunities and temptations to prey upon the community. There will be less fictitious credit, less overtrading, and the business of traders and others will be kept in closer relations with their own capital, and commercial piracy will sensibly diminish.

THE EXTENT OF OUR COUNTRY REQUIRES IT.

I would like to suggest another consideration from which I think the contention in favor of this bill derives no inconsiderable support. This is a great country. Its greatness can not well be exaggerated. Our commerce extends all over it, constituting a mighty network of exchanges. From its commercial centers the shuttles of exchange are flying to and fro from points near and remote, weaving mighty webs of internal commerce. There ought to be some national law to regulate the relations of debtor and creditor in that vast scheme of exchanges. They constitute, Mr. Chairman, the interstate commerce of the country; and it seems to me that there is about the same necessity for a law reg-ulating in some degree and preserving to some extent uniformity in the mode of adjusting the relations of debtor and creditor as there is for an interstate-commerce law to regulate and control the transportation of the commodities involved in this extensive system of exchanges.

Now, Mr. Chairman, by way of recapitulation-for it is too late

Mr. CULBERSON. Would the gentleman from Pennsylvania like to yield now and conclude his remarks to-morrow?

Mr. BROSIUS. Well, I am very sensible of the kindness of my honorable friend from Texas, but I have to go away early in the manning and I am just about to conclude my represent the morning, and I am just about to conclude my remarks. It ought not to say I am just about concluding, for there are several other observations that I would like to make, but I will not detain the House at this time. Members have always been extremely generous to me in the past; I feel like reciprocrating that kindness, and if I can have the consent of the House to add fow contents which I have not taken the time to read I will a few quotations which I have not taken the time to read, I will conclude in a few moments.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I move that the gentleman have unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will submit that request at the conclusion of the gentleman's remarks.

MERCY PLEADS FOR IT.

I am greatly indebted to my friends. Mr. BROSIUS. was about to say a closing word. I was saying, Mr. Chairman, by way of recapitulation, that under the law of nine-tenths of the States of this Union a bankrupt or insolvent debtor is forever in chains. He can never release himself excepting in a case where the State possesses a bankrupt law and discharges the debtor from the obligation of the contract executed after the passage of

I am not aware that there is a State in the Union having such a law on the statute books; I do not know whether there is or not. But if there is any situation in the world which could suggest the inscription that the poet found over the gates of hell, "Who enters here abandons hope," it is that of the despairing debtor who has been sweating under the burden of his debt for years. He is absolutely without hope. If there is such a thing as commercial death in this world it is hopeless insolvency.

Now, I submit in conclusion that it is humane, it is merciful to Now, I submit in conclusion that it is humane, it is merciful to relieve honest debtors from the body of this death upon the surrender of their property to their creditors. For these reasons, stated, I know, in a feeble and desultory way, I am for a uniform system of bankvuptcy in this country. And I shall regret more than I can express if we fail, before we are through with it, to so amend the bill that it will command the approval of the House and become a law. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be permitted to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection.
Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I do not see the entleman from Alabama in his seat, and in his absence I move that the committee now rise. The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OUTHWAITE reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bankruptcy bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

H., held Wednesday, September 21, 1893, regardless of political party or religious sect, in which these good people assert that there ex-ists to-day a great evil in our country, to wit, the manufacture and exportation of alcoholic liquors, whereby the self-indulgent and benighted inhabitants of many other lands are corrupted in body, mind, and soul, and they ask that the National Congress enact legislation which shall forever put a stop to the business of sending alcoholic poison to heathen people, under the severest of sending alcoholic poison to heathen people, under the severest penalties which are visited on slave catchers by land or pirates by sea. I move that the resolutions be referred to the Commitby sea. tee on Foreign Relations. The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE introduced a bill (S. 1132) for the relief of Sarah A. Moore; which was read twice by its title, and re-ferred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BLACKBURN introduced a bill (S. 1133) for the relief of the estate of Pearce Noland, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. COKE introduced a bill (S. 1134) to create the southern judicial district of the State of Texas, and to fix the times and places of holding courts in said district and in the eastern and western judicial districts of said State; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 35) transferring the exhibit of the Navy Department, known as the model battleship Illinois, to the State of Illinois, as a naval armory for the use of the naval militia of the State of Illinois, on the termi-nation of the World's Columbian Exposition; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Af-

REPORT ON CLIMATIC FEATURES, ETC., OF OREGON.

Mr. DOLPH submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring therein), That 5,000 copies, comprising the necessary text, tables, and charts, be printed of the paper entitled "Certain climatic features and the soil of Oregon," being a presentation of special information collected by the Weather Bureau for a long series of years as to temperature, rainfall, character of the weather, irrigation, and atmospheric discurbances, which are believed to have marked influence upon agricultural interests in the said State.

SEC. 2. That 1,000 copies be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 2,000 copies to be distributed by the Weather Bureau.

SETTLERS ON PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. MANDERSON. A few days ago the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Berry], who is chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, reported favorably the bill (H. R. 1986) to amend section six of the act approved March 3, 1891, entitled "An act to repeal timber-culture laws, and for other purposes." A similar bill was unanimously passed by the Senate at the last Congress. It is important for local purposes that the bill should be passed at the present session, and immediately if possible. I ask unanimous consent that it be now considered. There can be no possimous consent that it be now considered. There can be no possimous consent that it be now considered. mous consent that it be now considered. There can be no possible objection to the bill. It will lead to no debate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. FAULKNER. If it will lead to discussion I shall have to object?

Mr. MANDERSON. It will not. It can not possibly lead to debate If it does, I will withdraw the request.

Mr. HOAR. Let the bill be read for information.

Mr. HOAR. Let the bill be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, stc., That section 6 of an act approved March 3, 1891, entitled "An act to repeal timber-culture laws, and for other purposes," is hereby amended by adding in line il, section 2301, after the words South Dakots,
"and in the State of Nebraska;" so as to read as follows:
"And the provisions of this section shall apply to lands on the ceded portion of the Sioux Reservation, by act approved March 2, 1889, in South Dakota and in the State of Nebraska, but shall not relieve said settlers from any payments now required by law."

SEC. 3. That all acts and parts of acts in conflict with this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. MANDERSON. I will simply state that the bill is to give to settlers who are south of the north line of Nebraska the same privilege of settlement that has been given to those who are north of that line. By an omission at the last session of Congress those words were not inserted.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SCHOOL OF MINES.

Mr. DUBOIS. Yesterday I called up Senate bill 1040, but owing to objection it went over until to-day. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill at this time. The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for informa-

The Secretary read the bill (S. 1040) to aid the States of California, Oregon, Washington, Montana, Idaho, Nevada, Wyoming, Colorado, and South Dakota to support schools of mines, as fol-

Be it enacted, etc., That each of the States of California, Oregon, Washington, Montana, Idaho, Nevada, Wyoming, Colorado, and South Dakota shall annually receive 25 per cent of all moneys paid to the United States for the maintenance of a school of mines in each of the said States for the maintenance of a school of mines in each of the said States: Practiced, That said sum so to be paid shall not exceed the sum of $12,000 per annum to each State, nor shall it exceed the amount annually expended by each of the said States for said school of mines.

SEC. 2. That before any money shall be paid to each of the said States under the provisions of this act the Secretary of the Interior shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury that each of the said States is maintaining a school of mines within its borders in which students in attendance are given instruction in chemistry, metallurgy, mineralogy, geology, mining, mining engineering, mathematics, mechanics, and drawing, and that the students in attendance from other States are received into said school of mines on the same terms and conditions that the students from the said State are received.

SEC. 3. That the board of trustees of each of the said school of mines shall make a report each year to the Secretary of the Interior of the number of students in attendance at such school of mines, the State of which they are inhabitants, and the general course of studies pursued in said school, and the amount expended in the support of said school.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. FAULKNER. I reserve the right, if there is any discussion of the bill, to object to its further consideration at that

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection.

Mr. FAULKNER. No; if there is to be no discussion I shall not object to the consideration of the bill. I understand it is a unanimous report from the Committee on Public Lands.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair misunderstood the Senator from West Virginia. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PEFFER. I do not wish to object to its consideration, but I should like to have a brief explanation of the bill from the Senator who has charge of it.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. DUBOIS. I will state to the Senator from Kansas that a bill similar to this has passed the Senate two or three times for particular States. The Committee on Public Lands appointed a subcommittee, of which I was chairman, to condense all those bills and include the various States in one bill. The subcommittee did so, and the committee reported the bill in form precisely similar to the separate bills which have passed the Senate two or three times heretofore. It is designed to aid those States in which there are mineral lands in supporting schools of mines. The bill is so guarded that unless the State establishes the school and pays out as much money as is to be paid by the Government from the sale of lands, the Government will not give any money for the support of the school. In some States the schools are already established. In my own State we have a State university with a separate branch devoted to this particular purpose.

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho if the bill does not give a much larger percentage of the proceeds of the sales of the lands referred to than has heretofore been given to other States for such purposes of the proceeds of the sales of lands within their boundaries?

Mr. DUBOIS. I will state to the Senator from Tennessee that the amount is limited in the bill to $12,000 a year.

Mr. HARRIS. So I see; but is not a larger percentage provided for than there is any precedent for in similar grants to othes States heretofore?

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator from Idaho will allow me to reply, I will state that it is a larger percentage, and it is larger than it is now needed, but it is supposed that gradually the amount will be reduced that the Government will get for the mineral lands, and as the sum is limited to $12,000 it is quite immaterial whether it is 50 per cent or more of the proceeds of the land, because no school of mines can get more than $12,000.

Mr. HARRIS. I shall not object to the consideration of the bill, but shall content myself by voting against the bill, because I think it is not a good piece of legislation.

Mr. BERRY. A bill similar to this came from the Commit-

Mr. BERRY. A bill similar to this came from the Committee on Public Lands during the last Congress. I think the Senator from Colorado introduced a bill applying only to Colorado, containing the same provisions which are contained in the pending bill. There were several similar bills introduced in the We considered them there and united them in one bill, which is the bill now before the Senate, and we unanimously reported this bill. There was no effort made in the committee to increase the amount. It was believed that the amount would be sufficient as contained in the bill, and I never knew until yesterday morning, I think, when the Senator from Idaho informed me that the Senator from Colorado desired to increase the per cent. I told him that he could introduce such an amendment in the Senate and it could be considered then. I do not think the Senator from Colorado ought to insist on an increase without further consideration. I have no objection whatever to the bill assing as it came from the Committee on Public Lands, but if it is insisted that the amount shall be increased, then I would desire further consideration of the matter before the Senate ses on it.

Mr. TELLER. Then I will not make the motion that I said yesterday I would submit.

Mr. President, I wish to say a few words on the pending bill. A bill giving a donation to Colorado for this purpose has passed the Senate at least three times. The State of Colorado has maintained for fifteen or twenty years a school of mines that has been open to all the people of the United States. We have had students from all the Western States and Territories. We maintain a school of mines that I say here, as I have said before, has no superior on this continent, if it has in the world. I do not believe that there is a place in Europe, and certainly there is not another place in America, where better advantages are offered to young men who desire to study mining engineering, metallurgy, and general mining.

The most American students who have been distinguished in these matters have received their education in Freiburg, Germany, but Colorado opened its school some years ago and erected buildings. It is independent of our other State institutions; it is a separate institution. We provided in the constitution for its maintenance to a limited degree, and the Legislature makes appropriations every year. We have built up a school that is a pride of the State, which, I repeat has no superior anywhere, and I think it is entitled to the favorable consideration of the American people.

Mining is an industry that must occur in this country as applied to iron, coal, silver, gold, and copper. It certainly is proper that we should have a place in this country where Amerproper that we should have a place in this country where American youths can go without great expense being entailed upon them, as would be the case if they should go to Europe, or even to Columbia College in New York, which is a fine school of mines. For that re son some years ago I introduced a bill and it passed the Senate, as I said, practically unanimously three times. I hope the pending bill will pass.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Colored how much is noid by the State.

Colorado how much is paid by the State.

Mr. TELLER. I suppose it costs us $50,000 a year, if not more, to support that school of mines, to say nothing about the large amount put in the buildings.

Mr. HOAR. In addition to this donation?
Mr. TELLER. In addition to this donation.
Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator know the tuition, or is the tuition free

Mr. TELLER. The tuition, I understand, is free

Mr. HOAR. My puestion is not put with any hostility to the proposition, but with reference to whether there is an adequate proposition, but with reference to whether there is an adequate endowment for such a school separately. Suppose we make this donation, will the school have sufficient endowment besides?

Mr. TELLER. I can speak only for Colorado. So far as Colorado is concerned the school will be supported without any reference to this donation. It will be a little more efficient if it has this amount of money, but it will still be maintained, because we have a very large plant, with everything that is necessary to teach this branch of science.

Mr. HOAR. Is the school located at Denver?

Mr. HOAR. Is the school located at Denver?
Mr. TELLER. At Golden City, 12 miles from Denver. It is in the vicinity of the mines. It is a practical school and has done great good. It has a large number of students from other States, including New Mexico and States adjoining, and even some from Mexico. Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I wish to say that the State of South Dakota has maintained a school of mines since 1884. We have erected a building that cost about $50,000, and sustain a full corps of teachers devoted exclusively to this subject. It is independent of our other universities and State institutions. It is dependent of our other universities and State insulutions. It is located at Rapid City, in the Black Hills, and it has students from other States, the tuition being free. The school will be maintained, of course, whether the bill passes or not; but if this bill passes it will add to its efficiency and add to the advantage which it confers upon that mining region, and through its students to the surrounding States.

Further than that, a very large sum of money has been received by the Government for mining claims in the Black Hills, the region where the institution is located. It seems no more than fair that a portion of the money received from the safe of these mineral lands should go to the support of this institution. In the Black Hills in South Dakota there are minerals which are already successfully mining and shipping large quantities of mica, both for electrical and for domestic purposes.

We are also producing considerable quantities of tin. I believe it is demonstrated that the quantity of tin is sufficient to supply the United States in the near future. Difficulties have supply the United States in the near future. Difficulties have arisen in regard to one of the largest companies there that is producing tin, so that the output is small at present, but it is bound to increase enormously. We have vast quantities of asbestus, and lately, within the last two years, we have discovered a process by which gold can be separated from refractory ores, and an enormous increase in the output of gold has resulted. This year the product will be $5,000,000. There are also other very large bodies of refractory gold ores which assay well. But no process has been discovered by which they can be reduced. The solution of this question will furnish work for the student and scientific investigator, and is an additional reason why this school should be encouraged. school should be encouraged.

A bill similar to this one for South Dakota alone has passed the Senate twice, and I think now the prospect is that such a bill will go through the other House.

Mr. HÖAR. The only doubt in my mind, which led to the question which I put to the Senator from Colorado, is whether it is desirable that these institutions shall be entirely separate or if they should not be united with the agricultural colleges under the policy inaugurated by the Senator from Vermont[Mr. MORRILL]. Of course they are of great value; but, in the first place, you would get a better scientific library where you have one large institution than where there are separate institutions. In the next place, you would get famous men of special genius or learning and skill who could perhaps give their services to both and not be entirely taken up by one, where the teaching and investigation may be conducted by men of less distinction. But if there are in fact separate institutions already established and amply endowed, as I understand the two Senators who have spoken, of course in those States that question is settled and no one will propose to interfere with the policy which they have established. I put the question merely with a view of ascertaining the fact.

Mr. TELLER. In Colorado the school of mines is not endowed in the usual sense of an endowment.

Mr. HOAR. I mean provided for.
Mr. TELLER. But it is provided for by a provision in the constitution, and at every session the Legislature makes an appropriation of a greater or less amount for its support.

Now, I want to say a word further. I do not agree with the Senator from Massachusetts that a practical school of mines like ours would be better attached to an agricultural college. That ours would be better attached to an agricultural college. That is a business entirely independent, and we thought, and we think still, that they should be entirely separate.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, I said there were some advantages, but if they were already established separately of course they would remain so. My question was simply to see whether this gift of the Government was going to a good and a sufficiently equipped and provided-for school. The Senator will agree with me that it would be better to attach it to an agricultural college if it were a little insignificant thing that would not take care of itself; but if it be, as the Senator says, an institution receiving a grant of $50,000 as an institution already established I should not think of making any point on it.

Mr. TELLER. I spoke of the amount received. I do not know how much the Legislature appropriated, but I think at the last session there was an appropriation of $35,000 for addiknow how much the Legislature appropriated, but I think at the last session there was an appropriation of $35,000 for additional buildings, and those appropriations have been made year in and year out, more or leas, for the last fifteen years.

We are very proud of our school of mines in Colorado. We think it is one of the best in the world; and we should not like to connect it with any other institution. We have our State agricultural college, which has been a great success. The school of mines is entirely independent of any other institution. It is located at the foot of the mountains, in the immediate vicinity of where the practical work of the mines is done, where students can study practical mining as well as theoretical mining.

In the vicinity of the school are the United States courts, where students can go and listen to the testimony in cases of great importance, for the students there study mining law as well as mining, as they should. In every way the institution has been a great success. We are not here asking this donation upon any theory that we do not intend to maintain that instituupon any theory that we do not intend to maintain that institution. We intend to maintain it independently of the General Government; but we think, inasmuch as we are paying a great price for mineral land, and have paid large sums into the Treasury of the United States, the small sum of $12,000 proposed to be given is insignificant, and it certainly ought to be given as be given is insignificant, and it certainly ought to be given as an encouragement to such institutions.

Mr. WASHBURN. I understand from the Senator from Idaho [Mr. Dubois] that he is willing to accept the amendment which I suggested yesterday; which is to add Minnesota to the States named in the bill, and, therefore, I move to insert "Minnesota" after "South Dakota," in line 5.

We have mines of copper and we have deposits of iron in Minnesota larger and more phenomenal than can be found in any other State in the Union; we have also gold and silver to a greater or less extent on the north shore of Lake Superior; and I think there is every reason why Minnesota should be added to the list of States named in the bill. Therefore I move the amendment which I have indicated.

Mr. McPHERSON. I hope that this bill will become a law.

It seems to me to be a movement in the right direction, and

It seems to me to be a movement in the right direction, and that this aid ought to be extended by the General Government. The Western States named in the bill comprise the great mining districts of the country. The hills and the mountains are full of mine all wealth, not only of gold and silver, but iron, copper. mica, quicksilver, and many other minerals. It seems to me that a school of mines located in that region of country, immediately among the people most directly interested, where they have already a practical knowledge of mining and where it is desirable to reduce the cost of mining as well as the cost of reducing the ores and that an education, such as these cost of reducing the ores, and that an education, such as these institutions will provide, is of vast moment to the people of that section of the country and to the whole people of the United

It is very difficult to draft a young man from the extreme West to attend, for instance, the School of Mines in New York City, where he could secure that class of scientific and technical knowledge which could enable him to work with some degree of profit and progress in the mining and reduction of these ores. Therefore, I think the Government should spend its money to assist these schools right in the very heart of the district where the different kinds of ores are found, and many of them are refractory, which require some special practical knowledge and some special application of scientific knowledge.

Mr. FAULKNER. If there is to be no further discussion of the bill, I shall not interpose an objection to its consideration; but if there is to be further discussion I shall feel under obligation to do so.

Mr. HIGGINS. I should like to say a word. I want to say that I am in favor of this bill; I think it is right; I think it is well to reinforce the cause of education in the West in this well to reinforce the cause of education in the west in this well. specialty; but I call the attention of the Senate and, if need be, of the country to the fact that the same measure was not meted out to the South, when it came up with its great call for relief. out to the south, when it came up with its great call for relief. If the same policy had been pursued by the enactment of the Blair educational bill, it would have strengthened the ground for this measure, beneficent as I grant you it is.

Mr. TELLER. I voted for the Blair bill.

Mr. HIGGINS. I know the Senator did.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WASHBURN]; which will be

The SECRETARY. In line 4, after the word "Colorado," it is proposed to strike out "and;" and in line 5, after the word "South Dakota," to insert "and Minnesota," so as to read:

Thateach of the States of California, Oregon, Washington, Montana, Idaho, Nevada, Wyoming. Colorado, South Dakota, and Minnesota shall annually receive 25 per cent of all moneys paid to the United States by each of the said States for mineral lands within the said States, for the maintenance of a school of mines in each of the said States, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read:

A bill to aid the States of California, Oregon, Washington, Montana, Idaho, Nevada, Wyoming, Colorado, South Dakota, and Minnesota to support schools of mines.

ENGROSSMENT AND ENROLLMENT OF BILLS.

Mr. MANDERSON. There came yesterday from the other House a concurrent resolution providing that, commencing with the first day of the next session of Congress, engrossed and enrolled bills should be printed, instead of being written, as has been the custom heretofore. I notice that no disposition has been made of that concurrent resolution, except to order it printed. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Printing for their consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the concurrent resolution will be so referred.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. Towles, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 2689) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States to refund certain duties paid by James J. Haynes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate. The message also announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution authorizing the Pub ic Printer to furnish to each Representative and Delegate additional copies of the Con-GRESSIONAL RECORD.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. Res. 66) that the acknowledgments of the Government and people of the United States be tendered to various foreign governments of the world who have participated in the Exposition in commemoration of the discovery of America by Christopher Columbus; and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-President.

PURCHASE OF SILVER BULLION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed consideration of the bill (H.R.1) to repeal a part of an act approved July 14, 1890, entitled "An act directing the purchase of silver bullion and the issue of Treasury notes thereon, and for other purposes," the pending question being on the amendment pro-posed by Mr. PEFFER to the substitute reported by the Committee on Finance.

[Mr. STEWART resumed and concluded the speech begun by him yesterday. See Appendix.]

Mr. STEWART. As my colleague [Mr. JONES of Nevada] has not concluded his speech, I beg that he may be allowed to take the floor for a while.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask the Senator from Nevada to yield to me for a moment that I may call up a resolution reported favorably from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent nenses of the Senate.

Mr. JONES of Nevada. Very well.

DISTRICT CORPORATIONS.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of order of business 65, it being a resolution reported from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair).

The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution reported from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate by Mr. White of Louisiana, on the 13th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Corporations in the District of Columbia is hereby authorized and directed to continue the investigation provided for in a resolution of the Senate a topted July 27, 1892, with all the powers and authority conferred by said resolution.

Mr. ALDRICH. Iask for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the resolution?

Mr. ALDRICH. It is a resolution reported from the Committee on Contingent Expenses to continue the investigation which was commenced by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN]. It has the assent of all the committees.

Mr. QUAY. What is the subject of the investigation?

Mr. ALDRICH. Corporations in the District of Columbia.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 2689) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States to refund certain duties paid by James J. Haynes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

DISTRIBUTION OF CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives was read and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring). That the Public Printer be directed to furnish to each Representative and Delegate 22 additional copies of the Congressional Record, of which number 8 copies shall be sent, I each to such public or school libraries as shall be designated by each Representative and Delegate.

That the remainder of this number, 14 copies, he shall furnish to each Representative and Delegate during the extraordinary session of the Fifty-third Congress.

Mr. JONES of Nevada addressed the Senate in continuation of the speech begun by him on the 14th instant. After having spoken for over two hours, he said:

Mr. President, I have but a little more to offer. I feel that it is due to me to apologize to the Senate for the time I have taken. I scarcely know whether to denominate what I have presented an argument or an obituary. I take it for granted that the cause I have attempted in a feeble way to defend when the vote comes will practically be lost. With the indulgence of the Senate, feeling quite tired now, I will yield. It will take me but a short time to-morrow, if I can get the floor, to conclude the senate of the senat all that I shall have to say for some time on this question.

Mr. McPHERSON. May I ask the Senator a question before he takes his seat? As I understand the Senator now, he is in favor not of international money, but of a purely national money. He is in favor of exactly such money as India has had in her circulation since 1870. He proposes that this country shall have a money dislocation with all the rest of the world, so that if we owe a debt abroad we must translate our money into the money of the foreign nation to whom we owe the money before the debt could be paid, and if they owe us they must translate their money into our money before their debts could be paid. The Senator, I understand, prefers a silver basis, and silver is continually fluctuating in value, compelling the farmer, the producer, to sell his wheat and cotton and pork and beef for silver. That product is taken abroad and is sold for gold.

The American farmer must stand all the fluctuations in the

The American farmer must stand all the nucluations in the money between the time of the sale of his product and the time the product reaches the other side. I wish to know under that condition how it is possible for the United States of America to keep up profitable trade relations with any country that to-day purchases our products. If the Senator will bear with me still further, before answering this question, I will say in respect of the contention that arose between us a few minutes ago with respect to India.

respect to India-

Mr. JONES of Nevada. There is so much; I should like the Senator to ask but one question at a time.

Mr. McPHERSON. Very well, it is all on the one line. The Senator instructed me when I interrupted him a few moments ago that it was more proper to measure the value of money by the value of commodities than it was by other kinds and character of money; and I stated the case of an India merchant shipping wheat and cotton to Liverpool or to London for sale. I will now put the question in another form and ask the Senator to be so kind as to answer it.

The Indian merchant ships, say, one quarter of wheat to London. He is the producer of the wheat. It is sold in London for gold. It is worth, say, to-day 30 shillings a quarter. That would buy 30 shillings sterling in gold, or it would buy 15 rupees, if rupees were at par with gold. The rupees have fallen, they are worth to-day 1 and 2 pence. That quarter of wheat buys in London just 25 rupees, either in council bills or in silver bullion. The exchange, of course, or he may take the silver bullion back to India, and his mints are open. Now, how can the Senator say that silver has not fallen in India, when I show him that a bushel of wheat buys 10 rupees more to-day than with silver at par with gold?

Mr. JONES of Nevada. I think I will not overstate the point when I say that I do not believe there is a Senator on this floor who clearly understood the question of the Senator from New

Mr. McPHERSON. Very well; then—

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President—

Mr. McPHERSON. I will put it—

Mr. JONES of Nevada. I have tried, and I can not understand whether the Senator means it for a speech, or an answer, a question.

Mr. McPHERSON. Both.

Mr. JONES of Nevada. The Senator has made many postulates; he has assumed many things that I do not agree to at all; he has attempted to place me in positions that I have not placed myself in. He undertakes to state my position, which I prefer to state for myself; and after he has done this, he becomes so instant of the history and the present of the state for myself; and after he has done this, he becomes so instant of the state volved in his question that it is impossible to fully understand what he means

Mr. VOORHEES. I understand the Senator from Nevada desires to complete his remarks to morrow. I regret that he is not able to complete them now. I shall not press the Senator from Nevada upon this point, but I suggest, for economy of time, that he and the Senator from New Jersey meet between now and to-morrow when the Senator is to resume the floor and come to an understanding about the question that is asked and the man-an understanding about the question that is asked and the manner of answering it.

Mr. JONES of Nevada. I think it would take about that time.

Mr. VOORHEES. In the meantime, Mr. President, as there seems to be no one else ready to go on now, and not with a view of denying the right to anyone who desires to talk on pending amendments, I ask for a vote at this time on the amendment to the amendment of the committee, and let us get along in that the amendment of the committee, and let us get along in that pending question at this time.

Mr. VOORHEES. He can do it to morrow if he can do it at all.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEFFER] to the amendment in the nature of a substitute reported by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ALLEN. I call for the reading of the amendment to the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. After the word "repealed," at the end of line 13 of the amendment of the committee, insert the following additional sections:

SEC. 2. That any owner of gold bullion or silver bullion in condition fit for coinage, and of the coin value of $50 or more, may deliver the same at any mint to the proper officers thereof, and it shall be formed into coins for the benefit of the depositor in the manner provided by the act of Congress approved January 18, 1837, and in all respects according to the provisions of said act, all of which provisions, so far as the same are or may be applicable hereto, are hereby revived and reenacted, except that the inscriptions and devices of coins of like denominations now current shall be placed on the coins authorized by this act, and double eagles may be coined as provided in the act of February 12, 1873.

SEC. 3. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

I ask the Senator from Kansas how much time he would

Mr. PEFFER. Not very much.
Mr. VOORHEES. I will state my purpose. The way I deal with these questions is in perfect frankness. If the amendments are to lead to prolonged debate I shall ask the Senate to consider them under Rule VIII, confining debate to five minutes. and to one speech for each Senator upon an amendment. Otherwise, I shall resort to another method to dispose of them.

Mr. PEFFER. I submit, Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me just a moment, that this is not a very good time to restore the old tactics we had ten days or two weeks ago. I merely want to occupy a short time. I do not propose to surrender; neither do my political friends. Mr. VOORHEES. I have every disposition to yield, but there is so much misunderstanding as to what a short time is in this body that I should like to be reassured a little on that point. I have not the slightest disposition to press the Senator from Kan-Mr. PEFFER. If the Senator will permit me, I will try to

Mr. PEFFER. I have not yielded.
Mr. VOORHEES. I was on the floor long before the Senator from Kansas. I had the floor and asked for a vote on the pending amendment. I suppose the Senator misunderstood it.
Mr. PEFFER. When the amendment was read I addressed the Chair and was recognized.

Mr. VOORHEES. Yes; I was on the floor.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will hear the Senator from Kansas

Mr. PEFFER. Mr. President, I do not desire to occupy very much time, but some things have occurred within the last few days which make it appropriate upon my part to address the Senate at least for a short time on the pending amendment. It will be remembered that I offered an amendment somewhat similar to this early in the history of this discussion, and that when the Senator from Indiana moved to lay that amendment on the table I asked the poor privilege of explaining it and it was denied me. It was tabled unceremoniously. I now discover in the public prints of the day a statement to the effect that I have surrendered and that I have advised my political associates to surrender.

Mr. President, we have not surrendered, nor do we intend to do so. We intend to fight this proposition until the end; and when we are captured, if we are, it shall be with our arms in our hands and our faces to the foe.

All the free-coinage people have asked from the beginning is wrong which was perpetrated in 1873. This the pending amendment proposes to effect. When the act of 1873 was proposed and passed, the demonetization of silver money had not been subpassed, the demonstration of silver money had not been submitted to the people; it was not discussed in any political campaign; and while it was treated in this body and in the other branch of Congress from time to time during a period of two or three years, there was no opportunity whatever for any public judgment to be passed upon it. The evil work was done without the knowledge or consent of the voters.

Mr. President, we have reached a time which was some days ago announced by other Senators as well as myself when this ago announced by other Senators as well as myself when this discussion would probably end. We were asked repeatedly when we would be ready to vote on the passage of this bill. Our answer was uniformly (the same dropping from all lips which were called upon to utter the expression) that after we had time enough to discuss the bill and the amendments thereto in a reaching the deliberate cool capital and many many than the readsonable, deliberate, cool, candid, and manly way, then we would be ready to vote.

Now, Mr. President, in concluding what I have to say, I wish It to be distinctly understood here and elsewhere that my opposition to the bill is one of conscience, and based upon a principle. The passage of this bill, as I believe, will entail a wrong that can not be measured. It will start this country downward, or rather it will add to the momentum of our downward course towards a gold standard. It will depreciate the values of the towards a gold standard. It will depreciate the values of the products of all our labor. It will reduce farmers to tenants. It will reduce the wage-worker to virtual peonage. It will eventually put not only the money of the country, but all the great material interests, and all our intellectual forces—our politics, our legislation, and our judicial determinations, in the hands of one great overruling and overmastering power flowing from concentrated wealth. One-half of the farm lands which are now occupied in the civilized world are under mortgage for more than they would bring in cash if advertised to-morrow to be sold at thirty days' notice. Our farm renters have increased in this country in ten years from 25 per cent to about 35 per cent. The renters in cities have increased at even a much greater ratio

Those of us who are opposing the passage of this bill believe that the effect of the policy it foreshadows will be to continue this downward course, and that there will be no possible escape from it. We believe that the defeat of this bill would to that extent weaken the influences of the money-power; that it would take away one great support which is now maintaining its hold upon the people. We regard the bringing of this bill before Congress as an effortupon the part of what we call the money power to still more firmly and permanently fasten its clutches on the industries of the people.

We shall oppose it to the bitter end, Mr. President. We have no notion of surrendering, and expect to add still further opposition as the debate proceeds. However, as I said to the Senator from Indiana in the beginning, we do not intend to interpose any factious or revolutionary opposition, but we want at every stage of the proceeding, until the end comes, to interpose our determined resistance and our implacable opposition. That is all I care to say now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. Peffer] to the

Mr. DANIEL. It has been suggested to me that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] and the Senator from Washington [Mr. Squirke] stand paired, and that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] and myself may then vote. I beg that the pairs may be arranged in that manner.

Mr. QUAY. With the permission of the Senate, I will transfer my pair with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], and I vote "nay."

Mr. HARRIS. Has there not been a transfer of a pair already announced to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY]? There has cartainly been, but I do not remember with whom.

Mr. CULLOM. Let the pairs be announced.
The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pairs will be announced by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows: Mr. Pettigrew with Mr. Gordon.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon with Mr. SQUIRE.

Mr. CAMERON with Mr. BRICE.
Mr. HANSBROUGH with Mr. MILLS.
Mr. WHITE of California with Mr. CHANDLER.
Mr. COLQUITT with Mr. WILSON.

Mr. COCKRELL with Mr. ALLISON.

Mr. Morgan with Mr. Hawley. Mr. Hunton with Mr. Platt.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs upon agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. VOORHEES. I desire to say that the amendment of the Committee on Finance when adopted will stand as the original bill and be open to amendment as the original bill would have been, and every amendment offered will have its fair considera-

Mr. HARRIS. Allow me to suggest to the Senator from Indiana that the substitute reported by the Committee on Finance and the House bill are both, under the rules, original propositions and subject to amendment, but if the substitute shall be agreed and subject to amendment, but it the substitute shall be agreed to by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, it is not then amendable as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. VOORHEES. I intended to convey the idea that so far as I am concerned, and so far as the friends of the bill are concerned, it will be treated as the original would have been treated and be subject to amendment. The ground has been discussed all over. I am not at all afraid of amendments that may come in. I am perfectly willing that they shall be treated fairly. Some of them may be laid on the table; some of them may be subject to explanation under the eighth rule with five-millute speeches; but there are a great number of amendments, notice of which has been given. There are twenty-five or thirty amendments intended to be proposed, but none of them have been of ments intended to be proposed, but none of them have been offered as yet. I have agreed, for instance, with the Senator from California [Mr. Perkins] that he shall have a chance to offer his amendment; but I desire first to perfect the measure before the Senate by adopting the substitute, as the Senator from Tennessee denominates it, with the understanding that it shall be treated as the original bill would have been treated.

Mr. HARRIS. I beg to suggest to the Senator that we had better follow the parliamentary rule. Both of the propositions are open to amendment as they now stand, as substantive and original propositions, so that an amendment to either is amendable, but if agreed to, then under the parliamentary rule the able, but if agreed to, then under the parliamentary rule the proposition of the committee can not be amended as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. VOORHEES. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that after its adoption the amendment of the committee may be treated as open to amendment, as the original bill would be.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Indiana? The Chair hears none, and it is so

Mr. VOORHEES. Now, I ask for a vote on the substitute of the committee.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President— Mr. VOORHEES. I hope the Senator from Nevada will oblige me by letting the amendment be adopted, with the assurance to him that it will not prejudice his right to the floor. I am not aiming to cut off what remains of debate, but I should like to place the me sure in a little different form, so that we can go on and amendments will be in order.

Mr. STEWART. I have no objection to that course.

Mr. VOORHEES. Very well.

Mr. VOORHEES. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the question recurs upon the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance

Mr. HARRIS. With the distinct understanding, as I understand it, that when the Senate shall agree, if it shall agree to that amendment, that the amendment shall stand as the original amendment, that the amendment shall stand as the original proposition, and is as amendable as the bill as passed by the House of Representatives would be.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That has been agreed to.
Mr. VOORHEES. I have stated that to the Senate, and the Senate has given its unanimous consent.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Unanimous consent has been given to the proposition of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. HARRIS. I stated it simply so that there could be no misunderstanding.

Mr. VOORHEES. There could not be any.
The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance.
Mr. STEWART. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope whoever called for the yeas and nays will withdraw the demand. This is merely a formal matter. The text of the bill is still open to amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the roll call go on.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the demand will be withdrawn.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection, the Chair will state to the Senator from Ohio. The Secretary will proceed.
The Secretary resumed the calling of the roll.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the pending bill, which I ask may be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from California will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the word "repealed," in line 13, of the substitute of the Committee on Finance and insert:

on Finance and insert:

SEC.— That the mints of the United States shall be open to the coinage of silver of proved American production at the same parity now existing between gold and silver, with a minting or seigniorage charge of 29 per cent, which shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

SEC.— That hereafter no gold pieces for circulation of aleas denomination than $40 be coined, and no more legal tender, national currency, or Treasury notes of a less denomination than $5 be issued.

SEC.— That the holder of any standard silver dollars which have been or may hereafter be coined may deposit the same with the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States in any sum, and receive therefor notes of denominations less than $10 only, which notes shall have the same legal-tender quality as the coin for which they are exchanged. The coin deposited for or representing the said notes shall be retained in the Treasury for the payment of the same on demand.

SEC.— That in order to protect the mints against imposition no silver shall be coined under this act except such as is produced by smelters stunct officers or agents and fix their compensation and prescribe such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry this act into effect.

Sec.— That there shall be appointed a commission of five monetary experts, the members whereof shall not be otherwise connected with the Government, whose duty it shall be to keep Congress and the Executive advised on all necessary matters relating to the currency.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS].

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, it is a physical fact, well known to all who live upon the shores of the ocean, that the tide ebbs and flows regularly twice in twenty-four hours. It is also known to those who live upon the bays and harbors contiguous to the ocean that there is a period of time after the fleed tide has been running when it has reached its meridian height, or high-water mark, when it for a time apparently becomes stationary. This, in nautical parlance, is called "slack water." This debate has prevailed here for nearly three months. We have had the high flood tide of debate, and it seems to me we have now reached the slack water of that debate, when we can calmly and dispassionately consider the amendments to the pending bill; and if those which are presented commend themselves to the favorable consideration of the Senators upon this floor, if they believe that their result will be of benefit to the people of this nation, this is the time, at this period of slack water, when we can calmly consider such amendments, and adopt them if we believe them to be for the best interests of the country. This is a period of time when the careful mariner takes his vessel from stream to wharf, and from dock to anchorage, for he may then safely move his vessel without danger from the incoming tide. With that object in view I have offered the amendment.

I believed at the time when the bill was first introduced that it was necessary to vote either for or against it; that there was no was necessary to vote either for or against it; that there was no time to amend it; but after listening to and reading the speech of the able Senator from Alabama [Mr. PugH] and his argument, which has not been controverted, it seems to me that this is a time for the Senate to amend the bill, and for the Senate to give expression upon the subject, if they are, as each Senator has said, friendflip disposed towards silver and believe in bimetallism. If they believe that the people of this country want to use both gold and silver in the monetary system of our country—gold may be the right hand, but silver is the left hand of our monetary system—and as every Senator has averyesed his friendship. tary system-and as every Senator has expressed his friendship towards the use of silver, here is an opportunity when silence is not golden, for now is the time to speak, for by our action we are to decide this question. It is useless for us to make declarations, if we do not by our action carry out those declarations.

I desire, with your permission, Mr. President, to read the words of the Senator from Alabama. He said:

words of the Senator from Alabama. He said:

I undertake to state as a lawyer with more than forty years' practice and experience in my profession, including eighteen years' work in lawmaking, that when a statute law passed to supply a remedy or to correct or prevent existing evils is repealed for the reason that the law has failed to accomplish the object of its passage or has proved inadequate as a remedy, or corrective, or cure of existing evils, such repeal has never been proposed in a bill that did not contain other and better remedial legislation to accomplish the objects and remedy the evils which the repealed law failed to reach and accomplish. The new remedy or substitute always accompanies and precedes the repealing section in the same bill.

I challenge a denial by any reasonably informed man of the correctness of that statement. There never was a law repealed on account of its failure as a remedy that was not in the repealing act substituted by a better remedial law; and this is without precedent, and what nobody but these conspirators are capable of conceiving and enforcing.

An unconditional repeal of any law without substituting other remedial legislation is an unqualified admission that no such legislation is necessary, and the chances of securing the new remedy in a separate bill are diminished.

If this be true, Mr. President—and I believe it, for no Sena-tor on this floor has gainsaid it—if we are friendly to silver, surely we ought now to adopt amendments giving evidence of our good faith. our good faith.

Here I desire to say, in answer to my friend from Kansas [Mr. Peffer] and my friend from Novada [Mr. Jones], who spoke only a few minutes since, that I do not believe in the charge of conspiracy which has been made in relation to the act of demonetization in 1873. After listening to the speeches of the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. Sherman] and the distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. Allison] no impartial man can otherwise believe than that that law was drafted and enacted into our statutes they believe that the time that it was for the last our statutes, they believing at the time that it was for the best interest of this great nation. Therefore I think it is unjust and unfair to refer to it constantly as a conspiracy.

I wish to say at this point that I do not believe in or approve Therefore I think it is unjust and of the method of assailing men who are in high places. us who have occupied positions of trust, at times have felt ourselves prick d to the core because our actions have been unjustly construed or misconstrued and our motives impugned. believe that everyone who favors the unconditional repeal of the Sherman law from the President to the humblest man in Congress is equally as honest, equally as sincere, and that his motives are as pure as the motives of those who do not favor it.

But, Mr. President. we are all creatures, in a measure, of our environment. Unwittingly our characters and our habits are formed by our associations. Those of us who come here from the Far West may look at these things somewhat differently. These questions may present to us a different phase from what they do to our Eastern friends. While we claim honesty of purpos, we should be equally as generous, equally as liberal, and equally as considerate as those who differ with us.

Mr. President, even the sun, the great center of life in this universe, giving uslight and life and health and strength, shines only upon half of this great globe at one time. So let us be charitable to each other in our views.

Senators will see that the amendment which I have offered to the bill provides for the coinage of silver of proved American production, and anyone who has silver produced from a mine in the United States can take it to the mint and have it coined into silver denominations of such a class as he may designate; and it will all be returned to him less 20 per cent, less one-fifth of it, at the same ratio as now exists between gold and silver.

Those who believe that gold is not the only standard of value, those who believe that silver should have its place here, surely ought to favor this measure.

The product of our American mines will not average more than $40,000,000 per annum. One-fifth of this amount, or 20 per cent less, leaves but $32,000,000 for distribution among the people. We are increasing in population at the rate of nearly two millions per annum; and we shall require this much more money in the currency of our Government for the needs and requirements of

In doing this, too, we are legislating for American industries. Let us work for our own people and their interests. The silver we are producing from our mines is the product of American industry; it is mined by American citizens, or those capable of becoming such, and the supplies to carry on those mines are furnished from our factories and our farms, and that money is distributed among our own people. Let us do this, let us legislate for Americans first, and for our sister republics and other coun-

I should, if I believed it would receive the sanction of Congress, most cheerfully give free coinage to silver the same as to gold; but I do not deem it expedient at this time to offer such an amendment.

My amendment allowing 20 per cent for seigniorage is based on the production for the last forty or fifty years. An underwriting company, a life-insurance company, does not govern its rates of risk by the losses incurred in the city of Chicago or in the city of Boston, where great conflagrations swept over and destroyed those cities, but they rather take the average in all the States and the cities and towns in these States and then judiciously write their risks upon that, and in the end they may prove profitable investments to the underwriters; so those who write life-insurance policies take the average span of man's life and write accordingly. So with this product of our silver mines, it is the average production that we are speaking of; and, judging the future by the past, there surely will be no overplus of silver for our people.

The other sections of the amendment are self-explanatory. have proposed that no gold pieces for circulation of a less de-nomination than $10 shall be coined, and that there shall be no more legal-tender, national, or Treasury notes of a less denomi-

We have to day, Mr. President, $71,057,608 of one and two dollar bills in circulation, and $253,387,809 of five-dollar bills. We have of half eagles, $202,000,000; of quarter eagles, $28,000,000. We are coining half eagles at the rate of $11,000,000 per annum.

By withdrawing the greenbacks, the Treasury notes, and the national-bank notes from circulation a demand will be created for silver, which will go out among our people and become popular with them. In the West we have but a very limited amount of one and two dollar bills. The people prefer silver; and so would almost any man who had an eye to the sanitary condition of his family and himself. He knows that the greenbacks, after having been used a few months, stowed away in saloons and other places, may bear with them perhaps the germs of some fatal disease, which may enter the household and take away from it its brightest flower. Surely the people will welcome to their homes this bright white metal, with its honest motto, "In God we trust." Some of our Senators have spoken in derision of the motto. If there is any country which has reason to be grateful and to trust in God, it is the American people; and I say that God's blessings have been dealt out to them from the beginning of the century, from the birth of the nation, with a most bountiful and generous hand. The white metal is emblematic of the purity of our advocacy of this measure.

Mr. President, I do not see how any one, if he will carry out by his acts that which he has declared, can do otherwise than to favor not only the first section of my amendment, but the second, the third, and the fourth sections.

I shall not, however, weary the Senate longer. My five minutes have long since expired, but by your indulgence I have been permitted to continue beyond that limit. 'Therefore, I shall not trespass further on the Senate at this time; but if there is any disposition to favorably consider any of the propositions em-bodied in my amendment I shall ask for a division of them, so that the Senate may vote understandingly and intelligently upon

Mr. PEFFER. I desire to ask the Senator a question before he takes his seat, if he will allow me.

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.
Mr. PEFFER. I understood the Senator to assert, in making a simile, that gold is our right hand and that silver is our left hand. What I wish to ask the Senator is, why, if that be true, he is disposed to out off one finger from the left hand?

Mr. PERKINS. It affords me great pleasure to answer my friend from Kansas. I have been greatly instructed in listening to his many able addresses before this body. I stated, in substance, that in our monetary system gold was the right hand and silver the left hand. I am not disposed to cripple either hand; but, on the contrary, I would care for it and foster it. I should also go and do unto my neighbor as I wish him to do unto me.

Mr. PEFFER. Then why does the Senator wish to leave 20 per cent of the silver by way of seigniorage in the Treasury, instead of giving it to the owner of the bullion.

Mr. PERKINS. I prefer to give to my friend from Kansas and other friends throughout the country this 20 per cent. It is not given. Our Government is one of the people, and every individual in this land, humble though he be, is a sovereign of this great Republic.

Mr. PEFFER. Then, why not take off 20 per cent from the gold bullion?

Mr. PERKINS. If my friend from Kansas will get his friends on the other side of the Chamber to agree to it, I shall accept the amendment.

Mr. STEWART. Before there is a vote on the pending amendment I wish to make a few remarks about my vote on the other amendment, not to make a speech, but just to call attention to it.

I voted for the substitute reported by the Senator from Indianas from the Finance Committee. Of course such a vote requires an explanation. The amendment of the committee which was substituted contains for the bill as passed by the House a very muddy and involved promise, to make efforts to obtain free coinage in the future. That promise is, of course, like all other promises on this subject, liable to be broken.

If the bill is passed as amended, I wish to make the prediction that the promise will be disagreed to and be stricken out in conference between the two Houses, or, if it remains, the bill will never be signed by the President. It may become a law by nonaction of the President. It may involve a continuance of the session ten days in order that it may become a law in that way; but the President dare not make such a promise, and will not make it. He will not sign the bill. I voted for the substitute to give the President an opportunity to sign the promise or let the bill lie ten days and become a law without his signature. Of course, I have no respect for this promise, because such promises are made to be broken.

There is one other thing to which I wish to call attention in connection with the changes which have occurred since the last free-coinage measure was pending. I shall not refer to the attempt made last February to take up the bill, which proposed to repeal the purchasing clause of the Sherman act. This would probably not be fair, as there was 19 majority against taking it up, and some very violent remarks made against such a violent remarks made ag proceeding as the repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sher-

I call attention to the vote which was taken on the 1st day of July, 1892, after both of the candidates for the Presidency were nominated and after both the party platforms were promulgated. I find that there were eight changes in the vote to-day. I have been comparing that vote with the vote in July, 1892. I call attention to the changes which have been made, and state what would have been the result if eight changes had not occurred when the vote was taken to-day. The vote taken on the freewhen the vote was taken to-day. The vote taken on the free-coinage measure was a vote of the full Senate, the whole Senate on that occasion as on this being either present and voting or paired. So it was a big vote then, and the vote to-day is a big vote of the entire Senate.

On the vote taken to-day there were 28 for free coinage, the amendment of the Senator from Kansas being a simple free-coinage amendment. It revives the free-coinage act of 1837, and, if adopted, would place our finances exactly in the position, so far as coinage is concerned, where they stood before the passage of the act of 1873. It was a revival of the law as it stood since 1834; a pure and simple free-coinage amendment. The proposition voted upon on the 1st of July was also a pure and simple free-coinage bill. A change of 8 votes would have made 36 for the amendment to-day and 31 against, a majority of 5. If there had been no changes since the last vote on the question of freecoinage, the amendment would have been adopted, and a free-coinage bill passed by 5 majority. That is the way it would have

Those who have changed their views by the arguments which since then have been offered, are the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER], the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL], the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM], the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. Turpes], the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES], the Senator Mr. Sovypal and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES], the Senator from Mr. Sovypal and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES], the Senator from Mr. Sovypal and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VOORHEES], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHE ator from Washington [Mr. SQUIRE], and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON]. All those Senators either voted or were paired in favor of the free-coinage bill. If each of these Senators had voted or had been paired as they were on the former vote, the amendment of the Senator from Kansas would have been

That is the only remark I wish to make in this connection. Of course, this is no part of my speech on the merits of the case; but I thought the last vote ought to be explained.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I was cut short in my remarks, because I feared I was trespassing upon the time of the Senate, or I should have explained then that which I now de-Senate, or I should have explained their that which I have sire to do. By permission of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] I took from his amendment the section for the identification of the silver produced in the mines of the United States, believing it to be superior to my own plan. The section States, believing it to be superior to my own plan. relating to the exchange of silver dollars for paper money was taken by permission of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] from the amendment proposed by him. I only desire to give them credit for those sections embodied in my amendment, and should have done so in my remarks had I not been cut short

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, before voting upon this amendment I desire to submit a few remarks.

I came into this Chamber on the 4th day of March of this year.
On the 7th day of August I began my first legislative experience. I was elected to this body by the Legislature of the State once. I was elected to this body by the Legislature of the Satte of Nebraska because I was known to entertain pronounced views upon the subject of money reform, as well as other important reforms. I was fully determined when I took my seat in this Chamber on the 7th of August to fight this battle upon the question of free silver until grass shall grow next summer if I could get anyone to stay with me. I am not at all tired of this contest; in fact, I have hardly respectably gotten into it.

I stand here to-day, Mr. President, thoroughly and absolutely convinced of the correctness of the cause I represent; and although I have been accustomed all my life to listening to arguments and making and weighing them somewhat, within the logic, I have failed to hear an utterance delivered in this Senate Chamber during this discussion which has at all shaken me in my judgment upon this question; but everything which has been said has served to confirm me more completely in the correctness of the position I have taken.

I am sorry to see what may be called a backdown to some extent on the part of some of the advocates of free silver. If I had the experience in legislative work of some of the Senators who entertain the views I entertain, I should not only stay here until next summer, but I would stay until next year, and I would continue to stay until the Administration changed before this law should be unconditionally repealed, and before the great wrong which will be inflicted upon the American people by this unconditional repeal should be done to them and their interests.

I say now, Mr. President, if there are any Senators in this Chamber who have the true interests of the American people at heart, if there are enough of them who will raise the banner of the free and unlimited coinage of silver and carry it to victory here, I believe victory can be accomplished; and for one I will here, I believe victory can be accomplished; and for one I will stay with that banner as long as my strength lasts, entirely regardless of the time it may take to fight this battle.

I desire to say another thing. For a quarter of a century it has been my business to be something of a student and practitioner of the law. I supposed that I was reasonably familiar with the form, substance, and workings of this Government when I came here. I supposed that the only connection the executive department of this Government had with the legislative department was the connecting link provided by the Constitution of partment was the connecting link provided by the Constitution of the nation. Before that I had read, as I read now, section 3, Article II, of the Constitution, regarding the powers of the executive department so far as the legislative department is concerned, and it is as follows:

He shall from time to time

Speaking of the President-speaking of the rfesident—

give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may, on extraordinary occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them, and in case of disagreement between them, with respect to the time of adjournment, he may adjourn them to such time as he shall think proper; he shall receive ambassadors and other public ministers; he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed, and shall commission all the officers of the United States.

That section is the only provision of the Constitution which gives the President any power to communicate with either branch of Congress. The Constitution distinctly points out that such communication must be by message, or in some official way, but that manner has been abandoned; and I am well convinced that a majority of this Senate, being in favor of free silver on the 7th day of August, has been by some mysterious process, unknown to me, converted into a majority for unconditional re-peal. It is strange, indeed, that in these last days of the nine-teenth century the Chief Executive of this nation can reach out and change the complexion and opinions of a great body like

So far as I am concerned, Mr. President, I entertain for the Chief Executive of my nation nothing but high personal consideration; but if he were a representative of my own party, and undertook to formulate legislation outside of proper constitutional channels, I would stand up here in my place in this Chamber and denounce such action as I denounce such conduct here to-day.

Another singular thing is that there has not been a legislative day since ten days ago. One week ago last Tuesday we started upon a legislative day and we are continuing that day

It has been a time-honored custom-whether it is a rule or not I do not know—that the proceedings of this body should be opened by prayer. There has not been a prayer offered in this Chamber in ten days. I desire to say, Mr. President, that in my judgment it was fitting that this Senate should cease listening to prayers at the time it did and when it started into the accomplishment of this ment injudgment and the proceeding to prayers at the senate should cease listening to prayers at the started into the accomplishment of this ment injudgment and prayers at the senate should be a supplied to the suppli complishment of this most iniquitous of all legislation in our national history; and I suppose, after a time, when this uncondi-tional repealing act takes place and gold is set up as the single standard and the sole god of some, the men of Wall street and Lombard street, whose sympathizers are here and elsewhere outside of this Chamber, will come together and sing that good old song-

Nearer my God to Thee, Nearer to Thee.

For gold is their god. Not only so, sir, but in consequence of not having another legislative day, this Government is put at the absolute mercy of one man. It is a complete revolution of our Government. It takes here, for instance, unanimous consent, and has taken unanimous consent for the last ten days, to get a measure, however important it may be, before this body. pose something should occur requiring our instant attention, it would require the unanimous consent of Senators here to enable us to consider it. There is a complete change in the organization. The right of petition, held sacred under our Constitution, regarded as sacred by every citizen of this land, is cut off here in consequence of this continuous session. Every safeguard guaranteed to the people of this country by the Constitution must be abandoned or imperiled for the instant accomplishment of this infamous scheme. This is something that in my judgment ought not to exist in a legislative body of the dignity and responsibility of this.

Mr. President, I have heard for the last ninety days, repeated over and over again in this Senate Chamber, that all these gentlemen who want unconditional repeal are bimetallists. We have been told that the reason we can not have free and unlimited coinage of silver is because other countries will bring their silver here and dump it upon us. While I do not approve of the measure of the Senator from California now pending, while it does not meet my views of a proper coinage law. I propose to put to the test the sincerity of these gentlemen claiming to be bi-metallists and see if they will vote for it.

Here is an amendment that provides for the coinage simply of American silver and gives the Government 20 per cent seigniorage in its purchase and coinage. While I do not believe that the Congress of the United States should rob the silver miner, I propose by my vote to give them an opportunity to do so if they fit to do it and see what these professed bimetallists will do.

I desire to say, again, before I vote, that if the Senators who are leading the fight on this silver question will once more raise aloft the banner of the people and sound the tocsin of war, they will find the Populist representation in this Chamber marching with them to a triumphant victory. Let us continue the fight.

Mr. TELLER Mr. President, the proposed amendment of the Senator from California is a proposition for free coinage of the American product with a seigniorage of 20 per cent. For myself, I have never favored the coinage of the American product. I have never believed that that is good policy, or will be sound monetary law if it should ever be enacted into law. I have never put my advocacy in this Chamber of the free coinage of silver upon the ground that it would benefit especially the producer of silver. While, of course, I have not been insensible to the fact that it would benefit the State which I in part represent on this floor, I have never felt that I could ask the friends of silver to do what my judgment was against, and that is to limit the coinage to the American product.

I have not believed, and do not believe now, that the coinage of the world's product of silver that would come to our mints would in any manner threaten the finances of this country. I do not intend to-night to enter into any general discussion of that question. We have disposed of the free-coinage question to-day, at least so far as this session is concerned. Lamafraid, Mr. President, we have disposed of it for a much longer time than that. At all events, that has now ceased to be a live question before this Senate. The Senate, by a majority quite marked, has decided not to accept that amendment. While I do not favor this amendment in the first instance, yet it is so much better than the proposed law, and the condition of the American people would be so much better with this amendment incorporated into the law, that I shall cast my vote for it.

The amount of silver that would be received at the mintsunder this law could not be very great; certainly not more than we have been purchasing and storing away in the Treasury during the last three years. I will admit that there are serious objections to it; I will admit that it does not come up to the highest principle of monetary science; but, after all, it will furnish to the American people some additional currency; it will keep silver in the currency of this country; it will say to the world, if it shall be adopted, that the United States at least intends to utilize its own product, and we shall not present the wonderful spectacle to the world of a nation producing more silver than any other nation degrading, debasing, and destroying the value of our own product.

If somebody shall hereafter point his finger at me and say that I have had a selfish motive to induce me to vote for it because the people of Colorado are the producers of silver, I shall answer that on a former occasion, when there was no threat of this kind held before the American people—that is, the passage of a bill for the complete and entire demonetization of silver—I voted against a bill proposing to coin the American product. I should vote against it now if there were the alightest hope, if there were the slightest expectation, that we could secure something better.

slightest expectation, that we could secure something better.

But, Mr. President, I know the point to which we have come.

I know that with the passage of this act, which it seems to be declared here on this floor and elsewhere is to pass in a short time, you will have completed, ratified, indorsed, and approved the act of 1873. For myself, I do not care hereafter to hear any man condemn that act who votes for the unconditional repeal of the Sherman act and who votes against every proposition that comes before the Senate to recognize silver in the currency of this country in the future.

I do not care to take the time of the Senate to discuss this question, but I do feel bound to say a word or two with reference to the local interest that I represent in the State of Colorado; and I believe I might as well speak now as at some other time in the course of this debate.

Mr. President, the State of Colorado has been, is now, and is capable of being in the future, the great silver-producing State in the Union. There is in the world only one other political or ganization, if we except the United States, that has produced as much silver as the State of Colorado, and that is the Republic of Mexico. Our population is comparatively small; it is as great probably as that of the State of Malne; but it is infinitely bigger than the population of many of the States which have representatives on this floor who are concerned in securing the passage of this act. It has a population of active, intelligent, and aggressive producing men. We had 412,000 people according to the last census. Everybody in the State knew, however, that it was a defective consus; that we had many more people in the State than that. We have had large accessions to our population since that census was taken. So I may say that undoubtedly our population is or was on the let day of July, 1893, nearly 200,000 greater than it was represented by the census.

than it was represented by the census.

Mr. President, we are to be greatly hurt by the legislation that strikes eliver out of the menetary system of the United States. But if I believed that the retention of the Sherman law in our statutes would be injurious to the great body of the people of the United States, I would not stand on this floor and advocate its retention. If I did not believe that all the people of the United States were to suffer with us, I would not have protested for days and weeks, as I have here, against the pissage of this bill. For myself, I believe that there are many sections of the country that will suffer worse because of this legislation than will the State of Colorado.

At first we shall be the great sufferers. You can not destroy the industries of a State producing twenty-five or more million dollars of the precious metals annually without bringing great disester and distress upon the people. But the people of Colorado are not the people to surrender to adversity or to adverse conditions. They went to those wild, inhospitable lands, then the American desert, and since that time they have conquered the most stupendous obstacles. They took possession of a country distant from etvilization. So far, Mr. President, was it from the civilized centers, that every pound of freight that we took into that country for years cost us a quarter of a dollar. We have built cities and towns, and we have added nearly $500,000,000 of the precious metals to the wealth of this country. We have established at the base of the Rocky Mountains and across them—for our State contains a portion of the continent both east and west of the continental range—a civilization that is equal to that of any Eastern State.

We have a school system that no State can exceed in efficiency. We have all the appliances of civilization. We are maintaining for our people the highest possible opportunities for culture and education. We have done this with less assistance from the General Government than have any of the older States that have come into the Union in fifty years.

We are neither cast down nor dejected. We know what nature has done for us, and we know that a State with more than 100,000 square miles of territory, with more natural wealth than any State east of the Missouri River, will be able to take care of herself and to maintain her financial integrity in every respect in the future as it has done in the past.

respect in the future as it has done in the past.

We do not disguise the fact that we are to go through the valley of the shadow of death. We know what it means to turn out our 20,000 silver-miners in the fall of the year. We know what it means when, every man in the State who has a little money saved must put his hand in his pocket and draw it forth to keep from starying the families of the laborers of our State.

money saved must put his hand in his pocket and draw it forth to keep from starving the families of the laborers of our State. While we are ready and willing to meet the occasion, yet if anybody on this floor thinks for a moment that we are to be destroyed, I want him to understand that the State of Colorado will be infinitely stronger and greater than many of the States whose representatives are attacking us now by this infamous fluancial policy. We have within our borders more fron than almost any State in the Union; we have five times the amount of coal that the State of Pennsylvania has; we have gold fields that are asystuntouched; and when, as we shall by degrees, turn these discarded silver-miners to mining gold, coal, building stone, and the more valuable stone, marbie, we shall still have an existence and a prosperity that few States will have.

But, Mr. President, the iron will enter into our souls. We shall

But, Mr. President, the iron will enter into our souls. We shall not forget that in this contest, which has lasted for ninety days, the men with whom we have stood shoulder to shoulder in the economic battles heretofore have almost to a man forsaken us. We in the States of Nevada and Colorado have held those States in the Republican column for many a year: We have maintained a Republican majority in this Chamber by our votes. We have stood by our Eastern brethren who believed in the protective system, as we did, even when it would have been to our local interest to yet a grainst cartain recovery.

local interest to vote against certain measures.

But how much aid, Mr. President, have we had from them? How much sympathy? How much support? Has there been hour when the optonents of silver, the friends of repeal, could have held a quorum in this Chamber had it not been for the Republicans in this Senate? We had supposed, Mr. President, that we were entitled to at least a little sympathy. As the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] sid, we are flesh of their flesh and bone of their bone. We are the children of New England and the East. We left our friends in the East, but we took with us New England and Eastern ideas and incorporated them into the autonomy and prosperity of growing States. We shall not abandon the faith that is in us. But when we shall be asked to yield our judgment to their judgment upon economic question in the future, if we do not respond as promptly as we have responded in the past, I trust they will not be surprised.

This great controversy ought to have been settled by reasonable concession. This great controversy, in which the American people are so greatly interested, ought to have been settled, as all such great controversies have been settled in this country, by compromise and concession. Why was it not done? Because the members of the Senute on this side of the Chamber resolutely declared from the beginning that though the other side might concede to us something that would save our industry and would keep silver in the currency of the country, they would not. Nobody that hears me to night but will agree with me, that if on this side of the Chamber, the men sitting in frontof me had been as ready to concede som thing to the friends of silver as men who believed in repeal on the Democratic side of the Chamber, there would have been a compromise, not disgraceful nor disastrous, but beneficial to us and beneficial to all allike.

Mr. President, I know that compromises are not always good, and they are said not to be favored. But in all the great controversies of the past, I repeat, that have gone on in this body, ultimately there has come some concession, some mutual yielding. In this case there has been none. I am told now there is to be none. The die is cast. Our industries are to be stricken down without symmethy, and I feer, without request.

none. The die is cast. Our industries are to be stricken down without sympathy, and, I fear, without regret.

But, Mr. President, let me say for Color do that we owe to the East large sums of money. We have taken their capital, and we have returned to them honestly the gain. We shall do it

We shall not repudiate a dellar of our obligations. The yet. We shall people of the East who have forced this condition upon us will not find us retaliating by refusing to pay our debts. We shall now the last far hing. They shall say that we owe them nothing pay the last farthing. pay the last larthing. They shall say that we owe them nothing after the time shall have come for payment. We have, I repeat, the natural resources with which to pay. We shall husband our resources: we will develop other industries as far as possible, and we shall be independent in the road that we have marked and we shall be independent in the roll that we have marked out for ourselves, in which we have marched with credit and success so far in our history. There will be no repudiation. If the great railroad companies in that country can not pay the interest on the bends you held, that is not our fault.

As for our personal obligations on account of money that we have borrowed, and for which you hold our notes and bonds, we shall pay those. All this we know we can pay, and we intend to pay. The credit of the State of Colorado as a State and to pay. The credit of the State of Colorado as a State and of the individuals in the State has been, and is now, as good as that of any other portion of the United States. It will remain so. It will require a greater effort, greater serifices, and we shall be compelled at least for a time to go without profit, and, as I said before, the changed condition of affairs will bring disaster and distress. But the men who made their way over unknewn plains and through the mountain passes, who have built cities and towns and established a civilization of the character of that of Colo ado are not the people to sit down and surrender; and if we feel that we have been unfairly treated it will make no difference with us. It will but incite us to greater efforts in order that we may be in the future, as we have been in the past, independent of all men and all peoples, as we intend to be.

Mr. President, I shall vote for this amendment, because if it should pass it would be some relief to us. It would be greater relief to the people of the United States.

I do not intend to weary the Senate, but I can not allow this occasion to pass without saying that to me it is the most terrible moment of my legislative life. To me, Mr. President, it brings more anxiety, more fear, than any other moment since I cutered

What do I fear, Mr. President? I fear that we are entering upon a financial system from which there is absolutely no es-cape. I know that some Senttors on the other side of the Chamber will tell me that when this bill is out of the way they will introduce other bills looking to the rehabilitation of silver. Mr. President, I have no hope in that direction. I know, as I know that I stand here, there will be no favorable legislation for silver until the American people are heard from at the ballot box and heard from in a way that will compel attention to

Mr. President, when I speak of what the people may do, I do not underrate the great agencies with which the people have to contend. I know that it is the combined capital of the world. know that it is the money-lenders of Europe as well as the money-lenders and money-changers of this country. I know that they have the power to control the great agencies of thought. I know that they can and will control the great press of the country. Nay, more, Mr. President; they have the ability with country. Nay, more, Mr. President; they have the accuracy with their wealth to control more than the great press; they will control public and private thought and public and private influence.

Mr. President, the stake is too great to be lightly given up. they are contending. The men who own the money of the world, the bonds, the interest-bearing securities, know that if they can put this country upon a gold standard and keep it there five years, they have put the world upon that standard; and then we will return to the condition of things that existed prior to the discoveries of gold in California; prices will go as they have been going, gradually lower and lower; individual opportunities will be gradually lower and lower;

ties will be less and less.

Mr. President, all men ought to have equal opportunities. They will not have it under a system that makes one-half of the men the slaves of the other half. With the grasp that these men have upon the industries and the enterprises of the country there is but little hope.

Mr. President, I am not a pessimist. I never have been. I am an optimist. I have never seen disaster and distress growing out of policies simply because they did not meet my approval. I have had faith in the American people, and I have had faith in men generally. I amfull of hope and courage in all things corcerning my country. I can see the silver lining in every cloud. There never is a storm so dark that I can not see the coming light on the mountain top. But I can not contemplate the condition of the people now threatened without grave apprehension; nay more, without absolute terror. It strikes to

Mr. President, I want to warn the American people that if they do not now resist they will speedily enter upon a system of industrial slavery which will be the worst known to the human

Mr. VOORHEES and Mr. WOLCOTT addressed the Chair.

Mr. WOLCOTT. If the Senator from Indian desires—
Mr. VOORHEES. I was going to suggest that if we could dispose of the amendment offered by the Senator from California I would then move a recess until to-morrow at 11. I will accommodate myself to the Senator from Colorado. I have understood that the Senator from Colorado desires to offer an amendment and to be heard upon it, and I suppose it would be amendment and to be heard upon it, and I suppose it would be preferable to him to do that to-morrow.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I have no amendment to offer. I have a few words to say which will be applicable to the pending amendment. If the Senator does not desire a vote upon the amendment now it can go over until to morrow.

Several SENATORS. Go on. Mr. WOLCOTT. I will do as the Senator from Indiana deres. Does the Senator desire me to yield? Mr. VOORHEES. It is just as the Senator from Colorado pre-

Mr. VOORHEES. It is just as the Senator from Colorado prefers. If he prefers to go on now, he can do so.

Mr. STEWART. Let us adjourn.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Shall I go on?

Mr. VOORHEES. If the Senator from Colorado will oblige me by expressing a preference, I will act accordingly.

Mr. WOLCOTT. It will be mere convenient to me if the Senate will adjourn until to-morrow.

Mr. VOORHEES. I move that the Senate take a recess—

Mr. STEWART. Before that is done I should like to make a suggestion to the Senator from California to divide his amendment, leaving off the latter purk and taking a voice simply on the ment, leaving off the latter part and taking a vote simply on the question of coining the American product.

Mr. VOORHEES. That can be fixed afterwards. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 11 o clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 42 minutes p. m., Friday, October 27) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, October 28, 1893, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, October 27, 1893.

The House met at 12 o'clock, noon, and was called to order by the Speaker.

Prayer by Rev. ISAAC W. CANTER, of Washington, D. C. The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PAY OF CERTAIN EMPLOYÉS, COURT OF APPEALS, WASHING-TON, D. C.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treusury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the chief justice of the court of appeals of the District of Columbia, requesting an appropriation to pay certain employes of the court: which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

APPROPRIATION FOR DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Attorney-General, submitting an additional estimate of ap-propriation for the use of the Department of Justice; ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

SALARIES AND COMMISSIONS OF REGISTERS AND RECEIVERS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the S-cretary of the Interior, submitting estimates of delicien-cies in the appropriation for salaries and commissions of regis-ters and receivers; ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. Brosics, until Tuesday next, on account of important business. ENROLLHD JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. PEARSON, from the Committee on Eurolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly en-rolled joint resolution (H. Res. 66) that the acknowledgments of the Government and people of the Un ted States be tendered to various foreign governments of the world who have partici-pated in commemoration of the discovery of America by Christopher Columbus; when the Speaker signed the same.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege, and I send to the Clerk's desk an article from the Kansas City Daily Journal, of October 24, which Iask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

HUDSON'S FINE PLAN-SCHEME PROPOSED BY HIM TO THE LAND COMMISSIONER-LAMOREUX GIVES OUT THE STORY-INVESTIGATION WAS TO END WITH A FINE COAT OF WHITEWASH—STORY-INVESTIGATION WAS TO END HUDSON APPROACHED HIM, ASKING TO BE MADE A MEMBER OF THE IN-VESTIGATION COMMITTEE.

Commissioner Lamoreux of the General Land Office tells a story without reserve concerning Representative Hudson, and in his own language it is as follows:

"Soon after Hudson introduced his resolution to have an investigation of the department because of the charges coming from the opening of the Cherokee Strip, he came here to my office to see me. He introduced himself as the man who had introduced that resolution and he said that while he was down in the Congressional Directory as a Populist, he was not in fact. a Populist, except in name, and that he could be relied upon as a Pemocrat. "His position was such, however, that on the committee to be sent down to the Strip to make the investigation he could be sent with two members who were on the roll as Democrats and in this way the Republicans could be held off the board.

"Hudson said that we need not be afraid of anything from him. He would see everything just as the two known Democrats in the investigation committee, and in this way he urged the department to demand an investigation and get a committee that would smooth over everything and make it all right, provided they found anything that looked like official misconduct on the part of any of the clerks.

"He also became somewhat enthusiastic over the matter, and suggested later in the conversation that it might be a good scheme to make him chairman of the committee, and this would give it the appearance of placing the whole matter in the opposition.

"I told him, of course, that I would not agree to the scheme."

Aneffort was made to find Representative Hudson about the matter, but was unsuccessful. This statement is given from Lamoreux did not agree to lit. It may be that he recalled that Crisp is speaker of the House and has the matter in hand, and had the appointment of the committee, and the situation between Secretary Smith and Crisp is such that possibly Smith could not get the Speaker to agree to a scheme of this sort.

Possibly Chisp would like to see the facts brought out, as it would shelve Smi

Mr. HUDSON. Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to have read to the House a letter from Judge Lamoreux, Commissioner of the General Land Office.

The Clerk read as follows:

GENERAL LAND OFFICE, Washington, October 26, 1893.

MR. HUDSON: My attention has just been called to an article in the Kansas City Journal purporting to be a conversation had with "you in reference to your resolution pertaining to the opening of the Cherokee Outlet. I beg to state that the reported interview is entirely false, and in my judgment originated in the fertile imagination of some newspaper correspondent. The only remark I ever made about you in regard to the matter was that I understood your affiliations prior to joining the Populist party were Demortatic. As you know we have had no discussion whatever about any committee except the few remarks made before the Committee on Public Lands of the Husso. of the House. Yours, very truly,

S. W. LAMOREUX, Commissioner.

Hon. T. J. Hudson, House of Representatives.

Mr. HUDSON. Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say just a few ords. I might very well let the matter rest here; and, perhaps, being a new member, not accustomed to deal with these newspaper articles, it would be better for me to doso; but I want to say that when I introduced this resolution I did so in good faith, and in order that a fair investigation might be had and the truth ascertained.

There have been a great many things said about the manner of conducting affairs in opening the Cherokee Strip to settlers, and it has been charged that fraud has been perpetrated upon and it has been charged that fraud has been perpetrated upon the part of some of the men appointed under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior to take charge of that opening.

Whether the charges are true or not I do not know. All that I have ever said about it I said to the Committee on Public Lands. I desired a fair investigation, one that would show exactly what the truth is. I have not sought to whitewash anyone or to blacken the character of anyone; nor do I sympathize with any attempts that may be made by anyone to make political capital out of that matter. I do not believe that while I am acting as the representative of the people of my district I have the right to engage in any transaction or in any arrangement the right to engage in any transaction or in any arrangement that will do an injustice to anybody; and I want to say that my intentions, thoughts, and purposes have been in favor of the ascertainment of the truth and nothing else.

In addition to what Judge Lamoreux says, I wish to say that Judge Lamoreux and I never had any conversation about this committee. I went to see Judge Lamoreux in order to secure, if I could, the location of a land office at Arkansas City, believing that it would accommodate more settlers upon this Strip than any other location. That if the only time I ever went to interview Judge Lamoreux that I recollect, except one time prior to that, when I called upon him for the purpose of getting information for those who wished to settle upon the Strip.

The enthusiasm of the reporter in this case, as Judge Lamoreux says, caused him to draw upon his imagination for the whole story.

I have never at any time sailed underfalse colors or pretended to be any thing while in Congress but a Populist.

I believe that is all I care to say.

Mr. ALLEN. You do not know anything about the Senatorial fight in Georgia? [Laughter.]
Mr. HUDSON. I do not know any thing about the Senatorial fight in Georgia, but I have very great respect for the Speaker, and if he wants to be Senator, I hope he will be elected. [Laughter and applause.]

J. J. HAYNES.

Mr. CRAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 2689) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States to refund certain duties paid by J. J. Haynes.
The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States of America is hereby authorized and directed to ascertain the amount of dutles paid by James J. Haynes on the importation of istle from Mexico into the United States, at the port of Laredo, in the State of Texas, during the period from July 14, 1883, to February 26, 1884, both dates inclusive; and the said Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to refund to the said James J. Haynes any sum or sums so paid in duties not warranted by the law at the time of payment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. DINGLEY. Let us have a statement of the case first.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the gentleman from Texas may make an explanation of the bill.

Mr. CRAIN. Mr. Speaker, during the years specified in that bill the claimant paid duties on a certain fiber called sisil, a pulp produced by reduction, as the gentleman from Maine knows, of American elm. He failed to make his appeal in due time to the Secretary of the Treasury, as required by law and by the customs regulations, and of course was compelled to come to Congress for relief.

When the bill was originally introduced, several Congre ago, it was submitted to the then Secretary of the Treasury for his consideration. He replied that sisil was not dutiable, and recommended the repayment to the claimant of the amount which was exacted from him at the custom-house of Laredo, on the frontier. It has repeatedly been reported favorably, and the report of the present committee will show a letter that was received by Mr. Lanham, then chairman of the Committee on Claims, and which bears out the statement I now make for the benefit of the House.

Mr. DINGLEY. That is, the collector of the port imposed the duty on sisil on the supposition that the tariff provided

Mr. CRAIN. Yes, sir. Mr. DINGLEY. And the Department has decided against

Mr. CRAIN. Those are the facts.
Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman state the amount involved in the passage of the bill?

Mr. CRAIN. I had the statement, which I presented to the Committee on Claims. I think it amounts to upwards of $2,000. The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. Mr. DOCKERY. I suggest that the report be printed in the

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the report will be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The report is as follows:

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2689) authorizing the Treasurer of the United States to refund certain duties paid by James J. Haynes, respectfully report:

This bill was referred to the House Committee on Claims in the Fiftieth, and Fifty-first Congresses, and by both committees reported favorably.

James J. Haynes, the claimant, imported into the United States from Mexico, at the port of Laredo, between July 14, 1883, and February 24, 1884, a commodity called istic, upon which he was charged and paid certain customs duties. It afterward appeared that said customs duties were erroneously exacted of him, and that the istle imported was a nonduitable article; all of which appears from the letter of the Secretary hereto attached.

Your committee recommend that the bill do pass.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY Washington, D. C., April 2,

SIR: The Department is in receipt of your letter of the 28th ultimo, in which you request to be informed as to whether there has been a ruling of the Secretary of the Treasury that istie was a nondutiable article, and in reply you are informed that under date of the 11th of April, 1884, it was held by Judge Folger, late Secretary of the Treasury, that the "dried ther of a species of American aloe or century plant, which is procured by reducing the leaves to a pulp and then drawing out the fiber," and which was commercially known as istle, was entitled to free entry under the provision of the free list for "dried fibers * * * which are not edible * * and not advanced in value or condition by refining or grinding, or by other process of manufacture." A copy of such decision is herewith inclosed.

I would also state with reference to the bill inclosed with your letter, viz, H. R. 2966, entitled "A bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States to refund certain duties paid by James J. Haynes," on importations of istle from Mexico into the United States, in the port of Laredo, that the istle imported by the said Haynes was, at the time of its importation, decided by the collector of customs to be liable to duty, and that duty was duly assessed and collected thereon.

I would further state that the reason why duties so assessed on the said merchandise, and paid by Mr. Haynes, were not refunded, is that the importer failed to comply with the requirements of the statute (section 2931 of the Revised Statutes) as to protesting, appealing, and instituting sut, which, under the express requirements of said statute, rendered the decision of the collector of customs as to such assessment final and conclusive.

Respectfully yours,

I. H. MAYNARD, Assistant Secretary

I. H. MAYNARD.
Assistant Secret

Hon. S. W. T. LANHAM, United States House of Representatives.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and

On motion of Mr. CRAIN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EIGHTH ELECTION DISTRICT OF MICHIGAN.

Mr. WEADOCK. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of high privilege, touching the validity of the election of a member now occupying a seat upon this floor. I have here the petition of Mr. Henry M. Youmans, of the Eighth district of Michigan, a member of the last House, and a candidate for election as a member of this House, alleging that for various reasons, which he specifies in his petition, the election of the sitting member is not legal and valid, and asking that it be inquired into by such means as the House shall determine to be proper.

In connection with this matter I might say that it will involve an investigation of the existence and animus of a society which has become very general throughout the United States—a society which the petitioners and others contend is un-American, illegal, and, under the constitution of the State of Michigan, a treasonable organization. This society has gone to the length of ordering arms-

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order. It is impossible on this side of the House to hear what the gentleman is saying.

The SPEAKER. The House will please be in order. Members will take their seats and cease conversation.

Mr. WEADOCK. This society, which exists in several States, has become particularly offensive in the Eighth district of Michigan. Some of its members have gone to the extent of ordering arms in large numbers from the manufacturers of firearms in this country, and it is alleged that a reign of terror exists there owing to the machinations of this organization. I do not deem it proper at this time to go into the allegations of the petition.

Mr. LUCAS. What society is the gentleman referring to?

Mr. WEADOCK. It is named in the petition.

Mr. MORSE. Tell us its name.

Mr. MCRSE. Tell us its hame.
Mr. WEADOCK. It is the American Protective Association.
Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, is that a privileged matter?
The SPEAKER. The gentleman states that he rises to present a memorial relating to the title of a member to his seat, which is privileged.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Does that permit the gentleman to arraign any society?

Mr. WEADOCK. I am not arraigning any society.

Mr. MORSE. We understand you are.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. It seems to me to be arraigning a society when the gentleman says it is traitorous, and that it is procuring arms with a view of intimidating the public. All that does seem to me to be arraigning a society

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman to be stating some of the specifications contained in the memorial.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I make the point of order that the statement of the gentleman is not privileged, under the rules of

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman any resolution?
Mr. WEADOCK. I have a resolution. Let me state in reference to the point of order made by the gentleman—
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan will please send up the resolution, and then he can be heard upon it.

Mr. WEADOCK. Very well.

The resolution sent to the desk by Mr. WEADOCK was read, as

Resolved, That the memorial of Henry M. Youmans, an elector residing in the Eighth Congressional district of the State of Michigan, touching the election of WILLIAM S. LINTON as a member of the House of Representatives to represent said district in this House be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, be referred to a select committee of seven members, with power to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, and to employ a clerk and stenographer, and that said committee be authorized and directed to investigate the allegations of said memorial and report to this House; and the expenses necessarily incurred in the execution of this order shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Now, Mr. Speaker— The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan is entitled to the floor. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. There is nothing in this resolution that gives the gentleman the privilege, under the rules, to make any statements of the character that he has been indulging in. I move that this resolution be referred to the Committee on Elections.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has not the floor. The gentleman from Michigan is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Well, I make a point of order.
The SPEAKER. What is the point of order?
Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. My point of order is that this resolution is not a privileged resolution and that under the rules it should not be the Compilities on Floations. should go to the Committee on Elections.

The SPEAKER. Resolutions of this character have repeatedly been held to be privileged. The Chair understands that resolution is copied from one which was held to be privileged after long debate in the case of an election some years ago in Cincinnati, when there was an investigation—

Mr. WEADOCK. In the Forty-sixth Congress.
The SPEAKER. In the Forty-sixth Congress, as the Chair

as about to remark.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Was not the resolution in that case brought up by the sitting member himself?

The SPEAKER. Not at all. That was a memorial, as this is.
This is merely a memorial. It does not seek, as the Chair understands, to set up a title to this seat on the part of anybody, but alleges that the sitting member is not entitled to the seat.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Well, then, I suggest, even if this proposition is in correct form under the rules-and, of course, I submit to the ruling of the Chair upon that point—

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the point has been repeatedly ruled upon.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. The gentleman from Michigan had better wait, as I understand that the sitting member is not present-

Mr. WEADOCK. I insist the gentleman is not entitled to take the floor away from me.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois rose to a question of order, which he does not press. The gentleman from Michigan is entitled to the floor.

WEADOCK. Mr. Speaker, in the Forty-sixth Con-

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I am informed by gentlemen around me that the sitting member, against whom this resolution is directed, is not present; and I submit that a matter of this kind ought not to be brought up in his absence, even in the most in-

Mr. WEADOCK. In reference to that I desire to say that the sitting member is so rarely in his seat, that it is his fault, not ours, if a matter of this kind is brought up in his absence.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. That is a cheap expression, Mr. Speaker; a remark of that kind might apply to a good many members.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is not entitled to the floor. The gentleman from Michigan will proceed.

Mr. WEADOCK. Mr. Speaker, the resolution which I have submitted in this case is in substantially the same form as that which was adopted by this House in the Forty-sixth Congress in the case of Young and Butterworth. In that case a petition was presented by the electors of the city of Cincinnati alleging that the election was illegal and asking that it be investigated.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan will suspend

a moment till a message from the Senate can be received.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution and bills of the following titles:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 55) for the reporting, marking, and removal of derelicts:

A bill (H. R. 1986) to amend section 6 of the act approved March 3, 1891, entitled "An act to repeal timber-culture laws, and for other purposes;" and A bill (H. R. 3421) providing for the construction of a steam revenue cutter for the New England coast.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 1040) to aid the States of California, Oregon, Washington, Montana, Idaho, Nevada, Wyoming, Colorado, South Dakota, and Minnesota to support schools of mines; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

EIGHTH ELECTION DISTRICT OF MICHIGAN.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan will now resume his remarks.

Mr. WEADOCK. In reference to the suggestion made by the gentleman on the other side (Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois), I will say that if the member from the Eighth district of Michigan is in town I would have no objection to allowing this matter to stand over until to-morrow morning—
Mr. DINGLEY. I think the gentleman had better do that under all the circumstances.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. The sitting member ought certainly to have notice of this proceeding.

Mr. WEADOCK. I have no objection to that.
Mr. HAUGEN. If this matter goes over till to-morrow morning can we not have the memorial as well as the resolution printed in the RECORD? We want to understand what this case is.
Several MEMBERS. Let the memorial be printed.
The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HAUGEN] that in the case which has been referred to as a precedent there was some discussion as to the propriety of printing the memorial in the RECORD; and as the Chair understands the conclusion was reached that perhaps it was

Mr. HAUGEN. Well, I will not press the request, although I have been unable to hear all that the gentleman from Michigan has said.

The SPEAKER.' In the case referred to it was merely a statement of the contents of the petition published in the RECORD.

It was not given in full, because it was suggested that its publication might do injustice to some parties.

Mr. WEADOCK. I have carefully avoided making any statement reflecting on either party, because I do not desire to do so, nor do I deem it proper. I simply referred to the general questions which were involved, which could not concern him any more than anyone else and which affected the general question.

Mr. PAYNTER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. PAYNTER. I desire to know whether or not this resolution would not go to the Committee on Elections in the ab-lution would not go to the Committee on Elections in the absence of specific action by the House?

Mr. WEADOCK. It is withdrawn for the present.

Mr. PAYNTER. It proper, I now enter a motion that the question be referred to the Committee on Elections.

The SPEAKER. It is not now before the House.

Mr. WEADOCK. I will say, Mr. Speaker, to the House and to the gentleman from Kentucky, that the same question was presented in the Butterworth case, in the Forty-sixth Congress, and it was the judgment of Mr. Carlisle, Mr. Cox, Mr. Gartield, and others that an investigation should be made by a special committee rather than by the Committee on Elections, which is committee rather than by the Committee on Elections, which is supposed to be here at the capital all the time during the sesas of Congre

The SPEAKER. The matter is withdrawn for the present.

ADDITIONAL CONGRESSIONAL RECORDS.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged report.
The SPEAKER.

The resolution of the committee will be

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring). That the Public Printer be directed to furnish to each Representative and Delegate 22 additional copies of the Congressional Record, of which number 6 copies shall be sent, one each, to such public or school libraries as shall be designated by each Representative and Delegate. That the remainder of this number, 14 copies, he shall furnish to each Representative and Delegate during the extra session of the Fifty-third Congress.

The Clerk will read the report. The SPEAKER.

The report (by Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee) was read, as

The committee have considered the joint resolutions of the House, Nos. 35 and 47, to print additional copies of the Congressional Record, and direct me to report a substitute therefor. The substitute provides for the same number agreed upon and fixed by the provisions of the printing bill which recently passed the House. The committee recommend the adoption of the substitute herewith offered, and that the resolutions 35 and 47 is on the table.

substitute herewith offered, and that the resolutions 35 and 47 lie on the table.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The reason, Mr. Speaker, for presenting this now, and securing action upon it, is that we may get the copies during the extraordinary session. I have drawn the resolution to bring it in exact conformity with the provisions of the printing bill which passed the House last week. Unless we pass the resolution now we will not get the extra copies, because very likely the printing bill will not be considered by the Senate until the regular session.

Mr. DOCKERY. The substitute has not yet been reported, has it?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The substitute was read. That was the resolution read by the Clerk.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, the only necessity for it now is to get the copies of the RECORD during this session instead of waiting until the regular session.

Mr. DAVIS. The number is not changed?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. No, sir; just the same as

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. No, sir; just the same as was provided in the printing bill.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. I could not hear distinctly the reading of the resolution, Mr. Speaker, and may have misunderstood it; but I wish to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question. As I caught the reading of the resolution, if this House adopts it, it simply gives the additional number of RECORDS during this extraordinary session. But the amendment agreed upon in the printing bill provided for fourteen additional RECORDS for this session and eight additional RECORDS to be permanent.

for this session and eight additional RECORDS to be permanent.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. That is exactly the provision of the resolution. It covers precisely what was adopted in the printing bill.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Then it does not change the provision as passed in that bill? Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. No, sir; it is exactly the same

I ask a vote on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.
On motion of Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I ask that the original resolution referred to the committee be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. That order will be made.

BANKS AND BANKING.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to submit a privileged report. I ask the Clerk to read the report of the Committee on Banking and Currency which I send to the desk, with the accompanying resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as-follows:

The Committee on Banking and Currency, to which was referred the accompanying House resolution, calling on the Secretary of the Treasury for certain information in reference to banks authorized to issue circulating notes, having had the same under consideration, have instructed me to report a substitute therefor and to recommend that the substitute be adopted, and that the original resolution lie upon the table.

Your committee are of the opinion that the information called for can be furnished by the Treasury Department within a reasonable time, and when furnished it will greatly aid Congress in the consideration of pending financial measures.

For this reason the passage of the resolution embraced in the foregoing substitute is recommended.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the original resolution and then the substitute.

The original resolution was read as follows:

The original resolution was read as follows:

Recolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to inform the House the number and names of State banks and banking institutions that have suspened or failed since 1830, arranged by States, with the amount of capital, circulation, and deposits of each at the time of such failure, and the loss severally of suckholders, note-holders, and other creditors of said banks occatened by such failures; the amount of outstanding circulating notes of 813/e banks and banking associations each year since 1830, and the rates of exchange on New York, and the current value of the circulating notes of State and national banks as between the State where issued and the city of New York each year since 1830; together with the prevailing rates of interest in State banks, banking associations, and national banks since 1830, and the legal rates of interest prescribed or authorized by the respective States for the same period.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now report the substitute for this resolution, which substitute is reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Recoived, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to inform this House the number and names of State banks and banking institutions that have suspended or failed since 1830, arranged by States, with the amount of capital, circulation, and deposits of each at the time of such failure, and the loss severally of stockholders, note-holders, and other creditors of said banks occasioned by such failures; the character of the nominal assets and securities of each of said banks at the time of its failure from which on liquidation were realized less than their nominal value; the nominal and realized value respectively, of each class of such assets or securities; the means whereby and the extent to which the stockholders, the note-holders, and other creditors of each of such banks were, respectively, protected by provision of law was complied with or violated; the amount of outstanding circulating notes of State banks and banking associations each year since 1830, and the current value of the circulating notes of scanness on New York, and the current value of the circulating notes of scanness of scannes

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I will move the previous question and allow the debate upon this resolution to come up under the operation of the previous question, if any debate is desired. That will allow fifteen minutes on a side.

Mr. McMILLIN. I hope the gentleman will not insist on the previous question.

This is a pretty important resolution.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then I will withdraw the demand for the previous question, and will yield to the gentleman from Mis-gouri [Mr. HALL]. How much time does the gentleman want? Mr. HALLof Missouri. I do not want more than ten minutes. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Mr. SPRINGER.

Missouri [Mr. HALL]. Mr. HALL of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, as a friend of the re-peal of the 10 per cent tax on State banks, I am opposed to this resolution. Not that we object to any information of any kind or character that is fair. My objection to that resolution is that it calls for information that was gotten up by certain Republican agents of the Treasury after the Democratic party, in 1892, adopted a plank in its platform in favor of the repeal of the 10 per cent tax on State banks; and I maintain that anyone who will examine that evidence will see that this information was gotten out by Republican officials in the Department for the purose of proving everything possible that could be proved against State banks, and nothing in favor of them.

We do not object to light, provided the light is thrown fully on all sides and branches of the question, but if it is proposed simply to bring before the House that ex parte, one-sided, partisan evidence, gotten up in order to defeat a plank in the Democratic platform, I object to any such evidence being brought before this body. I maintain further that an investigation that will be exhaustive, as shown by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury in 1892, in response to a Senate resolution of a sim-I maintain further that an investigation that llar kind, can not be made complete, and that the evidence can not be obtained inside of three years' investigation. I therefore oppose this, because it will bring before this body simply the ex parte testimony gotten up by a body of men interested in defeating that plank in the Democratic platform.

Mr. DINGLEY. Does not this resolution call upon the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish this information, and do you think he would furnish partis in information?

Mr. HALL of Missouri. The object of it is to get that information that was compiled by a Republican Comptroller of the Currency about a year ago.

Mr. DINGLEY. Do you suppose the Secretary of the Treasury would send to this House any information that he did not believe to be reliable?

Mr. HALL of Missouri. The trouble of it is this: I can quote one passage of the Bible that says "there is no God," but if I quote the entire passage it says, "The fool hath said in his heart there is no God."

Is it fair to introduce then, as a statement from Holy Writ, that the Bible says there is no God?

The gentleman simply wants to bring in here, by that report, everything against the State bank system, and nothing for it. In other words, I object to any unfair, one-sided, ex parte statement upon the subject.

Mr. DINGLEY. That is not an answer to my question. My inquiry of the gentleman was as to whether he had any reason to suppose that the Democratic Secretary of the Treasury, with the characteristic fairness of the present head of that Department, would, in response to inquiries of this House, send information this House, and information this House, and information this House, and information this House, and information the second content of the content of the second content of the content mation to this House that would be otherwise than fair and just and covering the whole question?

Mr. HALL of Missouri. I will simply state this: that if the resolution pass d through this House, asking the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish specific information, that he, as a lawabiding officer, will comply with that request, although that specific information there is, as I have said, of partisan bias and

Mr. DINGLEY. Has the gentleman any additional information that he desires to incorporate in the resolution and asked for in the matter

Mr. HALL of Missouri. I can say that, following the report of the Comptroller of the Currency in response to a similar inquiry from the Senate in 1892, his statement was to the effect that this information could not be had complete at all, but only partially, by the expenditure of a sum of about $5,000, and that it would take some years to complete an investigation upon that matter

Mr. DINGLEY. Are you opposed to this House having offi-cial information on this important subject? Mr. HALL of Missouri. I have no objection to official information that gives information on both sides of the question.

Mr. DINGLEY. Do you propose to amend the resolution calling for any additional information?

Mr. HALL of Missouri. I do object to having ex parte matter lugged in before this House.

Mr. DINGLEY. But this comes from the Committee on Banking and Currency, which has a Democratic majority, and it calls for information from a Domocratic Secretary of the Treasury. It is a most remarkable suggestion that a Democratic Committee on Banking and Currency and a Democratic Secretary would give only partisan information.

Mr. HALL of Missouri. If the gendeman wants the matter made a little more specific, I will state to him that the resolution was passed by a bare majority of the committee, when there was just a bare quorum present, composed of Republicans and Democrats who were opponents of the measure.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I desire to ask the gentle-

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I rise to the point of order that the gentleman has no right to divulge what has transpired in the committee on the floor of the House.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I ask the gentleman—
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky will suspend. The gentleman from Indiana raises the point of order that it is not proper to state on the floor what has transpired in the committee room.

Mr. HALL of Missouri. I did not hear the statement of the gentleman.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. My point of order is that it is improper to state on the floor of the House what has transpired in the committee room.

Mr. HALL of Missouri. I did not state anything of a confidential nature which transpired in the committee room. I was speaking of the number present.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I understood the gentleman to be speaking of a combination on the part of certain members of the committee

Mr. HALL of Missouri. I did not charge anyone with combining, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will yield five or seven minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON]: but I understand the gentleman from Kentucky desires to submit a question to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I understood the gentleman from Missouri to state that he is a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, and that the committee has reported this resolution, which I have read, and it requires a very large amount of information to be furnished to this House. I desire to ask the gentleman from Missouri about how long it would require the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish that information to the House?

Mr. HALL of Missouri. I can only suggest what is stated by the report I referred to a moment ago, given by the Secretary of the Treasury in response to a somewhat similar resolution of the Senate, in which he said it would take several years.

Mr. DOCKERY. Will my colleague allow me to ask a queson? I did not catch the reading of the resolution. Do I understand that the resolution calls on the Secretary of the Treasury for information compiled during the last A iministration?

Mr. HALL of Missouri. That is all the information he has.
Mr. ALLEN. I desire to ask the gentleman from Missouri a question. Is there anything in the office of the Secretary of the reasury, or does this resolution recite that the Secretary of the Treasury has in his office any information in connection with the failures of those banks that could only be found there; and, if not, why should that inquiry be made of him any more than of any-

Mr. HALL of Missouri. I suppose the gentleman understands very well that the United States Government had no jurisdiction over State banks during their existence. I have nothing further

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.
Mr. SPRINGER. How much time does the gentleman from Indiana desire? Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Five or seven minutes; only a short time.

Mr. SPRINGER. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana. Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I very greatly regret that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Hall] has seen fit to submit to the House the remarks which he has just made. I am not aware that the Committee on Banking and Currency has yet divided upon partisan lines, and it is hardly necessary to precipitate a division upon those lines into that committee from this House. I want to say that, so far as I am concerned as a member of the committee, I am in search of all the light upon the subject with which it has to deal which I can possibly obtain, and I think that in this respect I am simply in the same boat with all the other members of the committee, regardless of party affiliations. The committee desires to get information, to the end that it may be enabled to discharge its duty to the House and to the country.

Gentlemen are not excluded from the doors of the committee room simply because they may advocate particular views or because they may belong to particular parties. Every means of information that the committee can possibly get it desires to secure, no difference from what source it is derived. I trust that I am not revealing the secrets of the committee room when I say that gentlemen of this House have been heard there in support of measures which are in the line of removing the tax upon State-bank circulation, and I doubt not that any gentleman who desires to present the contrary view will be hospitably welcomed by the committee.

The objection of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Hall] that the report submitted by Secretary Foster in response to a resolution of the Senate, a year or so ago, was a Republican document, is entirely unfounded, from the fact that the information upon which that report was predicated was derived from the reports of Democratic officers in States where the State-bank system prevailed. Nor is it true that the then Secretary of the Treasury, when he submitted that report, said that it would take three years to furnish the information called for in the resolution here pending. The information called for in that Senate resolution was much broader and required much more research than that which is called for in this resolution, and I am credibly informed that the present Secretary of the Treasury has informed certain members of the committee that the information here called for can be furnished, most of it, by the 1st day of December next, and all of it in a much shorter period than three years, or even in a shorter period than three months.

This information is called for, not from a Republican Secretary of the Treasury, but from Democratic source, from the present Secretary of the Treasury; but, whether it is called for from a Republican or from a Democrat is immaterial. It is sufficient for me to know, and in my humble opinion it ought to be sufficient for the House to know, that the call is made not upon a partisan, but upon a sworn Government official; and in God's name if the time has come in this country when a committee of Con-gress can not appeal to a great official of the Government for information and expect to get it in all its purity, untainted by partisan considerations or partisan feeling, then it is time for us to shut the doors of our committee rooms and cease to attempt to procure information upon which to formulate measures for the good of the whole country.

So far as I am personally concerned, I earnestly hope that the light which is asked for by this committee, and which can be obtained by the adoption of this resolution, will not be denied by the House, but that all means will be cheerfully and promptly authorized which will enable the committee to act intelligently and to do justice to itself, to the House, and to the country; which will enable the committee to lay before this House for its consideration, not some crudely constructed bill, but a measure of such merit that the House will be justified in adopting it as a just measure of relief to the people. I want to say, too, that the information called for by this resolution can as well be used in favor of as against a bill for the repeal of the tax on State-bank Information with respect to the operations of the circulation. national banks can be readily obtained, because they are of comparatively recent origin, and, by the wisdom of the law under which they are organized, provision is made for statistics.

The mere fact that it is somewhat more difficult to get information to the statistics of the statistics of the statistics of the statistics.

mation with respect to the organization and operation of the State banks which, particularly as banks of issue, run further back in the history of the country, is of itself a reason why this committee should be allowed to have the light which the officials of the Government can furnish. I am prepared to accept that information when obtained and to rely upon it, whether it comes from a Republican or from a Democratic official; and I, for one, shall consider it far more valuable coming, as I say, from the sworn officers of the Government than if it came from some gentleman holding peculiar and illy digested financial theories, and who came before the committee perhaps to mislead rather than to give them trustworthy information on which to predi-

Mr. TURNER. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that any member of this House would object to any fair inquiry into the matters covered by this resolution or would refuse to the House the opportunity to obtain in anyway information on these subjects. But on glancing at this resolution it is apparent that almost the entire scope of it relates to matters over which the Treasury Department never had any jurisdiction whatever. The greater part of the resolution has reference to the history of State banks for a period from 1830 to the beginning of the late war, and minutely pursues all the details of those institutions, the character of their assets, the nature of their charters, the provisions of law regulating them, the rates of interest that they charged, and the dividends which were received by creditors and stockholders on the failure of such banks.

The Secretary of the Treasury can himself have no official information on these subjects. It is said that there is in the Transury Department, in the hands of somebody there employed, some collation of data on this subject; but that would be no better than a printed volume from any other quarter, except that it would come here through the official channel, without the official sanction of the Treasury Department. If it is desired to print a volume of information on this subject, I see no objection to its being done in the proper way. But why should the Treasury being done in the proper way. But why should the Treasury Department undertake its preparation?

There is pending before the Committee on Banking and Currency a bill to repeal the prohibitory tax on the issue of State banks. I acquit the honorable gentlemen of that committee, whether on the majority or the minority side of this question, of any purpose of delay; but will not this resolution furnish the occasion for delay? And when it is remembered that to this resolution a requisition on the Secretary for copies of all laws in force in the several States on the 1st day of January, 1860 and in force in the several States on the 1st day of January, 1860 and 1893, respectively, for the organization of State banks, banking institutions, and savings banks, and the regulation or supervision of the same, it will be seen that in order to comply with this resolution the Secretary of the Treasury will be obliged to have compiled a volume as large as the Revised Statutes.

Mr. SPRINGER. Oh, no.

Oh, yes.

Several MEMBERS. Mr. CULBERSON. The gentleman will allow me to say that I understand the collation to which he has referred was made during the last canvass by parties in the Treasury Department with the view of embarrassing the Democratic party upon that plank in its platform.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Is not the gentleman from Texas aware that the proposition is to address this inquiry to a Democratic official, who, if he considers the information already col-

gentleman.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I was endeavoring to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], who temporarily had the floor; and I asked him whether he was not aware of the fact that this inquiry is addressed to a Democratic official, who may reject the data already on hand if he thinks it inaccurate, and may cause the work to be done anew.

Mr. TURNER. I will endeavor to answer the remark of the gentleman from Indiana as well as the suggestion of my friend from Texas.

I remember very well that during the last Congress an effort was made to have printed by order of Congress some such com-pilation as that to which my friend from Texas has referred, and the House refused to have it printed, the motive for the refusal being that which he has suggested—that it was a compilation perhaps conceived, conducted, and prepared under the exigency created by a provision in the Democratic platform which had then recently been adopted at Chicago. I will not say that the then recently been adopted at Unicago. I will not say that the person, whoever he may be, that prepared that compilation meant to deceive anybody; but we all know with how much suspicion a specially prepared manual on a subject of that kind is justly regarded when it is inspired by a political exigency. I concur, therefore, in the spirit of the suggestion of the gentleman from Texas, and say that if this volume thus prepared is the only collation of information we are to have in response to this resolution, I should myself regret to see it made the basis of discussion and action in the committee or in the House.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Will the gentleman kindly permit me

Mr. TURNER. I will. I was coming to the gentleman's in-

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Is the gentleman afraid to trust so distinguished a Democrat as John G. Carlisle, the official who is to be requested to give information on this subsect to the com-

Mr. TURNER. I was endeavoring to come to that very pertinent inquiry; it is a proper one in this discussion. If the present Secretary of the Treasury himself or any other Secretary of the Treasury of any party should send to this House a document prepared under his own direction in response to a resolution, from official data I should treat it with great respect. What I meant to say was that a political compaign document, prepared by some subordinate in the Treasury Department, for use in a campaign, and from unofficial information, is not one that com-mends itself to my judgment. Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. May I ask the gentleman whether

Mr. TURNER. If the gentleman will pardon me I will endeavor to answer the full scope of his question.

I have the most unbounded confidence in the present Secretary of the Treasury. He is incapable of any unfairness. And I concede with pride that a report upon facts within his jurisdiction, by any Secretary of the Treasury of any party would command the respect and confidence of every citizen. But to require the Department to seek outside information as accessible to each of us as to him, and to compile it for our use in so vast a volume as will be necessary, will not only be a mockery of his official functions, but will indefinitely delay the consideration of the measure to which I have referred. Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana.

I am assured that we can get the information within a month.

Mr. TURNER. And I tell the gentleman I know something of these matters myself. I know that to make this compilation complete—to answer fully all of the details involved in the resolution of inquiry-will require a force of clerks and clearness of judgment, an amount of careful and painstaking study and research, that would occupy the entire force of the Census Office, with all of its experts, for a long time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. But the gentleman says this calls

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. But the gentleman says this calls for information that the Treasury does not possess.

Mr. TURNER. Then the Treasury Department would have to answer that it could not furnish the information called for.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. But I simply call attention to this part of the gentleman's argument to show the inconsistency. He says that the Secretary of the Treasury can not furnish the information; which defeats his argument that the reference of the resolution to the Department would involve a considerable delay.

Mr. TURNER. Take either alternative: If we are to have as an answer to the resolution the campaign document to which I have referred, we do not want it. If we are to have the response to the inquiry that the information can not be furnished, it is equally objectionable; and if it is to be a complete collection of equally objectionable; and if it is to be a complete collection of all the information necessary for a full answer to the interroga-tory, it must, as I have said, involve a considerable time and the necessary postponement of the bill to which it relates.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. PAYNTER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Georgia whether or not the resolution here proposed calls for Mr. TURNER. My time has expired.
Mr. SPRINGER. I will yield to the gentleman a moment

Mr. SPRINGER. I can only answer in this way; that the information I get from all sides is that there is a prepared statement in the Treasury Department already.

Mr. PAYNTER. I wish to ask the gentleman whether he thinks that Mr. Carlisle would adopt that statement?

Mr. TURNER. And my friend from New York [Mr. TRACEY] hands me now a volume which purports to contain some of the information called for.

Mr. TRACEY. Which I think would satisfy the gentleman

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Nothing will satisfy the "gentleman from Indiana" except to get the information which is so

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, if I can have the attention of the House for a few moments I think I can explain this matter to their satisfaction.

The resolution as originally introduced by myself was deemed by one of the members of the House, not present now—I refer to Mr. WARNER of New York—as not calling for such information as those who favored the rehabilitation of the State banks destred, and in the interest of those who favo red the repeal of the 10 per cent tax on the State bank issues, the gentleman sug-gested a number of amendments to the resolution as originally

These amendments submitted by Mr. WARNER were all accepted and embodied in the substitute which has been reported to the House. If there is a gentleman here more earnest in favor of the repeal of the 10 per cent tax on State banks than he, I do not know it. The gentleman from New York has at all times, on the floor of the House and elsewhere, avowed himself as an earnest friend of the proposition to repeal the tax on the circulation of State banks, and he has suggested all of the propositions, save the last, which are embodied in the resolution, which will bring out as he extend the facts that these who favor the will bring out, as he stated, the facts that those who favor the rehabilitation of State banks desire to draw out.

So far as the campaign document, to which the gentleman from Georgia refers, is concerned, that is already in existence and has been printed by the Senate Finance Committee and is in the document room. If it is going to do anybody any harm that has been already accomplished.

Mr. CULBERSON. Does not the

Does not the gentleman know that the document to which he refers is only a part of the collation?

Mr. SPRINGER. I stated that the document to which the gentleman referred as the campaign document is already printed

Mr. CULBERSON. I beg to suggest that that statement is incorrect to this extent, that that document only proposes, and whether it purports to do so or not the fact is, that it only pre-

Mr. SPRINGER. I stated, and I hope the gentleman will understand, that the document to which the gentleman referred was already printed, and if it has not been printed heretofore, then the objection which he made does not apply; because he was referring to something that had been printed heretofore, and which was given out as a campaign document.

Mr. CULBERSON. No, I do not understand that—
Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman from Illinois pardon me for a moment? I understand that the document to which reference is made was not printed until two months after the election.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman referred to a certain document.

ment as a campaign document. I will state that the document to which reference was made was not printed by the Treesury Department until January 28, 1893, and saw the light of day for the first time through the Committee on Finance of the Senate, the first time through the Committee on Finance of the Senate, after being transmitted by the Secretary of the Treasury at that time. So that if it was prepared for the purposes of the last campaign, it did not get to the people until after the election was had. But I want to say to gentlemen that so far as I am concerned, I have not prepared this resolution with any desire whatever to embarrass this question one way or the other.

Nor do I wish to be understood now as throwing any obstacle in the way of the consideration and the final passage, if you please of a measure removing the 10 per cent tax users.

please, of a measure removing the 10 per cent tax upon State

I want to say further, and I believe I may be permitted to say it, in answer to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Turner], who says that this was intended to delay that measure, that, without revealing the secrets of the committee of which I am chairman, I may state, as it was done in public, the reporters being present, that a day has been fixed by the committee, namely, the 14th of November, upon which day bills relating to this subject will be made a special order in the committee, as against all other matters, and considered until disposed of.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I will ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] if that is not the second bill that is being onsidered out of innumerable bills before the committee?

Mr. SPRINGER. All the bills on the subject of repealing the State-bank tax have been referred to a subcommittee, and the time for hearings upon that subject will expire on the 14th of next month. Then the committee is to consider that subject until it is disposed of; and I do not believe there is a member of that committee, whether he be for or against the removal of the tax, but what is in favor of an early hearing of the question.

tax, but what is in favor of an early hearing of the question.

I do not know of any desire on the part of anyone to throw any obstacle in the way of reporting the measure to the House, and I state here that the passage of this resolution will not delay the committee's report on that subject one hour or one moment, because I am in favor of the earliest possible report.

Mr. HALL of Missouri. I desire to ask the gentleman if in this Executive Document 38, part 1, to which he refers, he does not find the following language? Afterstating that he had made various verbal reports, the Secretary of the Treasury says:

various verbal reports, the Secretary of the Treasury says:

This opinion-

That is, the opinion that it is very difficult to obtain this inis confirmed by that of Mr. Spofford, the Librarian of Congress, who under date of November 30, states that "No systematic history or comprehensive statement exists of the operations of American banks for the long period since 1830, embraced in the Senate resolution of July 28, 1892." Mr. Spofford also expresses the opinion that "the information called for may be partially gathered from widely scattered sources in the books, pamphiets, and periodicals of the last sixty years relating in a greater or less degree to financial subjects."

That is the kind of information that he is calling for to govern the action of this body.

Mr. SPRINGER. I was just going to read the letter of Mr. Spofford, the Librarian of Congress, when the gentleman interrupted me, to show that the information which is called for by this resolution is not now accessible to members of this

Now, we are about to enter upon the consideration of the question of removing the 10 per cent tax upon State banks, a question of far-reaching consequence and importance. Everyone will concede that. Surely no member of this House desires to shut any avenue of approach to all the facts that are necessary for the thorough consideration of this question. If the Secretary of the Treasury can not furnish this information he will tell us. If he can, he will give it to us. I do not wish the Secretary of the Treasury to make information, to manufacture facts, or to set up a job upon this House, to propagate any particular theory upon this subject. We simply call for facts. Whether they be favorable to or against the question I do not know. Let us

Mr. ALLEN. The gentleman from Illinois says, as I understand, this information is not attainable by members of this House. Will you tell me how it is any more attainable by the Secretary of the Treasury than by members of the House, who could secure it by an investigation made by the gentleman's own committee, appointed for that purpose? [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. The Secretary of the Treasury has a very numerous force, while the committee has but one clerk, and the memb rs are very busy in answering their correspondence and attending to their business. The Treasury Department is a wast institution. It has agencies all over the country. It has subtreasuries in every part of the country. It has clerks everywhere. It could call upon the agents of the Government, in the where. It could call upon the agents of the Governmeat, in the employ of the Treasury Department, that he may select all over the country and speedily obtain this information.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. I want to ask the gentleman if he has not been informed by the Secretary of the Treasury that it would require an additional force in his office, and at least three or four months' time to acquire this information?

Mr. SPRINGER. I have learned from inquiry that a large proportion of this information could be furnished the House on the first day of December next.

the first day of December next.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. What portion of it?

Mr. SPRINGER. I can not go into the details.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Is it not that portion which has already been compiled as to the affairs of State banks?

Mr. SPRINGER (continuing). And that the other information, which is embraced in the resolution, and which can not be furnished by that time, could be furnished within three months from that time provided that Congress shall in some appropriation bill that may hereafter be passed make some appropriation

Mr. HALL of Missouri. If the gentleman will permit me to interrupt him, right in that connection, on the question of time, I find on page 3 of this partial report, the third paragraph on that page, the following sentence;

The reports of the State officers charged with the duty of receiving and supervising bank returns quite generally give full and detailed returns of failures and resulting losses, but no abstract of the same can be made which would properly present the facts, save at very great labor and expense, which would require at least two years' work of a thoroughly competent and experienced clerk.

Mr. SPRINGER. That would be one competent and experienced clerk; but we have more force at the disposal of the Secretary of the Treasury than one clerk. I have been informed since this other report has been submitted that a great deal of the information has been procured since this report was published last January.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Right in that connection you have called the attention of the House to the fact that the Committee called the attention of the House to the fact that the Committee on Banking and Currency has fixed a day for the consideration of the bill for the repeal of the State bank tax, and that that is to be about the middle of November, and we have resolved that that matter shall be continued until concluded. Therefore, how can this information which you seek be of any benefit whatever to the Committee on Banking and Currency, when they will have been dead to the committee on secretaring the committee on a secretaring the committee of the committee on a secretaring the committee of the committee of the committee on the committee of passed upon this matter long before the committee can ascertain what the information is to be.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is generally supposed that there may be a vacation, which will carry the date beyond the day fixed, and that we will not be able to report upon this question before the first day of December next.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. It has to be discussed in the committee still.

Mr. SPRINGER. And that while the committee would de mand, if Congress were in session, the consideration of the sub-ject at that time, the time in which it would be considered has not been fixed. If we do not get the information nobody will be injured, and if we do get the information we will be that much better off.

Mr. TATE. Do I understand the gentleman to say that he desires to get this information in order to reach correct conclusions upon this subject, and to aid him in that purpose, as well as the members of this House?

Mr. SPRINGER. Are you through?

Mr. TATE. Is that the purpose?
Mr. SPRINGER. My object is to obtain the information for my own use, and for the use of the gentleman from Georgia and other members of the House,

Mr. TATE. Then I apprehend that the gentleman has not formed any opinion as to how he shall vote upon this bill to repeal the 10 per cent tax on State banks, and that he is still open to conviction.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am. I will come to no final judgment until I have heard all the facts; and when I get them I can vote upon the question.

Mr. TATE. Then you are still open to conviction?

Mr. SPRINGER. I am still open to the facts, and I hope that my friend is open to the facts, and will also open his mind to the truth.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Is the gentleman from Georgia still open to conviction on this question:

Mr. TATE. I am converted to the views of my party on this question, as set out in the Chicago platform.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will now yield to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, this is almost the first time in my experience ir this House for many years that I have seen a resolution calling on the head of a Department for proper information on any important proposed legislation resisted. There is before the Committee on Banking and Currency, and probably will come in some form before the House, one of the most important propositions of legislation that has ever been suggested, namely, the abolition of the tax of 10 per cent on State bank circulation with a view of republificition. State banks of instances in the control of the state in the control of t culation, with a view of rehabilitating State banks of issue in lieu of national banks. In order to reach a correct judgement respecting the matter, in view of the fact that State banks of issue have not existed for many years past, it is of the highest importance that not only the Committee on Banking and Currency, but that every member of the House should have all possible information as to the workings of the State banking system during the period in which it existed in this country.

I desire that light: you, Mr. Speaker, desire that light. Every gentleman in this House desires or ought to desire whatever light can be shed upon this subject. It is suggested that the information called for in the resolution submitted by the Committee on Banking and Currency is so voluminous that it can be the presented in constant of the presented in the second of the second not be presented in season for us to act upon it. I noticed when the resolution was introduced by the chairman of the commit-tee that it called simply for four classes of facts, which seemed to me, glancing over it hastily, to embody, with perhaps one exception, all that was specially vital in the matter. That exception was information as to existing statutes in the several States regulating the State banks which would govern them in case the tax should be repealed and they should proceed to issue Circulating notes to be used as money.

It seems from the statement of the chairman that the gentlemen in the committee who are in favor of the repeal of the tax on State-bank circulation caused the resolution to be amended so as to call for a much larger amount of information, in directions which they supposed would somewhat favor their position. Therefore, if more information is called for than could have Therefore, if more information is called for than could have been readily obtained, it is simply because gentlemen who are in favor of repealing the tax on State-bank circulation have insisted on changing the resolution by adding these additional items of information, and calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish them to this House. I desire for one to have not only the information requested in the original resolution, but all the information that can be obtained on this subject.

I want all possible light in reference to this question, and I am sure that the information called for, so much of it as may not be in the Treasury Department, can be obtained by the Secrebe in the Treasury Department, can be obtained by the S tary of the Treasury either at the various State capitals where it is a matter of public record or from other accessible sources. There is no difficulty about that, it seems to me, and I understand the chairman of the committee to suggest that substantially all this information, all that is essentially vital, may be ready by the 1st day of December.

If gentlemen want this information there is no difficulty in obtaining it in season to act upon this exceedingly important subject. If they do not want it, if they want this House to be forced to a vote on so vital a question as this without light, then they will continue to resist this resolution and will endeavor to prevent the obtaining of this information.

But, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that this House, whatever may be the views of gentlemen respecting this question of State banks, can not properly defeat an effort to obtain whatever information can be secured in season to be of service to those who are called upon to take action upon this important question; for to my mind, Mr. Speaker, no more important question, as affecting the currency of this country and our prosperity in the future, can be presented to this House than that which is involved in the proposition to rehabilitate the old State-bank system.

I hope, therefore, Mr. Speaker, whatever may be our present I nope, therefore, art. Speaker, whatever may be our present views respecting this matter, that the House will insist upon obtaining all the information that is practicable upon a subject of so great importance as this, and I think I can not be mistaken in saying that if this House shall vote down the proposition to obtain this information—not partisan in ormation, but informa-tion sought through a Democratic Secretary of the Treasury in whom we have confidence, information that must in its very nawhom we be official—that action will be taken by the country as a distinct declaration that this House is a fraid of the light which this information would shed upon this most important issue. I hope, Mr. Spaker, that the resolution will be adopted.

Mr. SPRINGER. How much time have I left. Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has thirteen minutes remaining.

I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mr. SPRINGER.

Tennessee | Mr. McMillin].

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Dingley] begins his address with the announcement that in a long experience he has never seen a call for information resisted in the House. Let us not be misled by that specious declaration. Why did not the gentleman state the fact that this is an extraordinary resolution, that this is blazing out a new way, that this resolution is seeking to call on a Department of the Government for information that is not in possession of that Department and over which it has no jurisdiction. No one who resists this resolution desires to shut off any light. The gentleman need have no fear of that disposition prevailing here. That does not characterize the members on either side of this

But what is this resolution? Why is it resisted? Why does it meet with resistance which is not usually given to resolutions asking for information? It is because we are in this resolution solemnly calling upon the Treasury Department for the compilation of statistics that it has not got, information in relation to acts that Congress never passed; information that it has never been the duty of any Secretary of the Treasury to compile or to keep. This resolution calls upon the Secretary for information concerning the failures of State banks, information that never concerning the failures of State banks, information that never was in the Treasury Department, that never was supposed to be within the jurisdiction of that Department, that never will be in that Department, and which, even if it could be obtained, would that Department, and which, even if it could be obtained, would be inaccurate and misleading, from the fact that the sources of that information have never been accurately kept. Now, suppose we could get a report such as is sought here.

What you want is light, you say. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] wants light; the gentleman from Indian Mr. JOHNSON] wants light; the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] wants light. Would any data prepared under this resolution, even if accurate, lead to any accurate conclusion as to the merits of State bank institutions? We all know that in the midst of their greatest power, and probably in the midst of the merits of State bank institutions? We all know that in the midst of their greatest power, and probably in the midst of their greatest prosperity, an unfortunate civil war broke out which rent asunder the Union, which separated the States, which put citizens at war with each other, and through which not only private fortunes melted as snow before the sun, but State banks burst, and even the credit of the United States went down until its obligations were not worth 50 cents on the dollar.

And now it is proposed to get here as data that shall guide the And now it is proposed to get here as data that shall guide the House, information concerning that period, and from a source that never could give accurate information on the subject. And this is to be our guide. In addition to the calamities that overtook the country by reason of that war, these very institutions in the midst of their enthrallments and troubles were taxed out of existence by the Government of the United States. Hence the information sought will not be such as to lead accurately. the information sought will not be such as to lead accurately members who are to legislate.

Now, what if we were to call on the State Department for this information? There is just as much law for that Department to keep data of this sort as for the Treasury Department; there is just as much law for calling on the Secretary of the Interior to obtain information of this sort as there is for calling on the Secretary of the Interior to obtain information of this sort as there is for calling on the Secretary of the Interior to obtain information of this sort as there is for calling on the Secretary of the Interior to obtain information of this sort as there is for calling on the Secretary of the Interior to obtain information of this sort as there is for calling on the Secretary of the Interior to obtain information of this sort as the secretary of the Interior to obtain information of this sort as the secretary of the Interior to obtain information of this sort as the secretary of the Interior to obtain information of this sort as the secretary of the Interior to obtain information of this sort as the secretary of the Interior to obtain information of this sort as the secretary of the Interior to obtain information of this sort as the secretary of the Interior to obtain information of this sort as the secretary of the Interior to obtain information of this sort as the secretary of the Interior to obtain information of this sort as the secretary of the Interior to obtain information of this secretary of the Interior to obtain information of the Interior of Interior Inter retary of the Treasury. Neither of these Departments has ever had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and neither of them has ever kept any compilation of the kind sought to be brought in here. Who is to do it? Where are the clerks to come from? How the data obtained?

Besides it will be utterly impossible, as has been shown here, to get the information within the time indicated by the gentle-man from Indiana; and in proof of that I would, if I had time, read a paragraph handed to me by my friend from Missouri Mr. HALL, from the letter already referred to of the Secretary on this subject. As my time is about to expire I can not do that.

It shows the difficulty, and indeed the impossibility, of obtaining the information sought. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. OATES. Will the gentleman allow me toask him a ques-

Mr. McMILLIN. My time has expired, or I would do so with pleasure.

Mr. SPRINGER. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR]. Mr. BLAIR. Mr. Speaker, I suppose that we all recognize— I know that the people do in my part of the country, without any reference to party—that the substitution in the future of a system of State banking for that of national banking is not improbable; and those interested in the national banking system—business men, presidents of banks, and others—are, I know, somewhat anxious with reference to the nature of the system which shall be established. If a new system is adopted, those are the men who will of necessity organize the banks and administer, as heretofore, the banking business of the country tofore, the banking business of the country.

Now, this State banking system is a thing of the past. I do not understand that it was directly destroyed by the breaking out of the war. The evils of the State banking system originated even earlier, and were in process of elimination when the war assailed the country, and they went out of existence. There are sources of information with regard to them that have never been fully exhausted. Through the Treasury Department, if through any Department, that information can be obtained. It will not be found to be matter of record to any great extent at the capitals of the States; but fragments of this information—perhaps in many instances full historical data—will be found in possesin many instances full historical data—will be found in possession of the banks themselves, of old men who managed those banks and who were the financiers of their generation.

Now this information has been to some extent embodied in the book which I hold in my hand—a partisan document. What we ask, or what I for one would like to see is this—that the remaining information be obtained as fully as possible, and that it come to us through the medium and under the scrutiny of officials of another party now in possession of the Government, so that we may obtain the whole. Otherwise we should be likely and the country would be likely to judge the State banking system by the partisan information embraced in this document, for there would be no other information obtainable which could go to the country as authentic.

Mr. SPRINGER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SPERRY].

Mr. SPERRY. Mr. Speaker, among the measures of legislation for which the country looks to this Congress is one which is not the least important of all—a measure which may furnish some regulation in relation to our banking system. The coinage question, I hope, is disposed of; at least it has been disposed of if the sentiment of this House expresses the sentiment of the country, and if the Senate will follow that expression of sentiments.

I hope the tariff will be so amended that that question will be disposed of for at least ten years. One of the most important of the remaining questions—and it seems to me more important than the tariff—is, what shall be our form of banking? That question is before the Banking Committee; that committee working faithfully upon it, and will continue to work faithfully until it can present to this House some system which at least a majority of the committee shall feel justified in recommending for a permanent system of banking.

majority of the committee shall feel justified in recommending for a permanent system of banking.

Now, I think this House may be divided upon that question into several parties. One party would be willing to continue the national debt for the sake of continuing the national banking system. I am not one of that party. Another party is willing that the Government should be the only source of issue of paper money. I am not of that party either. There is another party—and it counts among its members strong and very respectable men, sincere in their motives and in their votes—who are now anxious, by a repeal of the tax on State-bank issues, to bring again into existence the State banks in all their weakness and in all their strength—to do it even heatily, and I may say with in all their strength-to do it even hastily, and I may say without information and without the opportunity for the house to out information and without the opportunity for the house to obtain information (which is clearly within our reach) in relation to the history of the State banking systems.

Now, my friend from Tennessee [Mr. McMillin], my friend from Georgia [Mr. Turner], and nearly all the other gentlemen who have spoken on this question, have told you that the Secretary of the Treasury has no jurisdiction of this subject and no information upon it. I grant to my friend from Tennessee and my friend from Georgia that the resolution now under discussion is somewhat more comprehensive than the legitimate jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Treasury over State banks.

Mr. OATES. Will the gentleman allow an interruption by way of suggestion?

Mr. SPERRY. Certainly. Mr. OATES. The gentleman from Maine thought no inquiry for information had ever been rejected. I find however that in the last Congress, at the first session, a resolution making similar inquiry, but not going as far as this, introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], was laid on the table by a yea-and-nay vote of the House. This present resolution is so sweeping in its nature that the information can not be obtained in any reasonable time.

Mr. SPERRY. I think, in answer to the suggestion of the gentleman from Alabama, that the Secretary of the Treasury is the proper official to inform the House whether or not that information is otainable; and in that connection I do not hesitate to believe that the Secretary will send promptly all the information that is obtainable.

Now, further in that connection, Mr. Speaker, and for the information of my friend from Tennessee, among others, I beg leave to read from this partial report, which is already made, a resolution which passed Congress July 10, 1832, looking to the compilation of information as to the condition of State banks throughout the country:

Resolved. That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before the House at the next and each successive session of Congress, copies of such statements or returns showing the capital, circulation, discounts, specie deposits, and condition of the different State banks and banking companies, as may have been communicated to the Legislatures, governors, or other officers of the several States within the year, and made public; and where such statements can not be obtained, such other information as will best supply the deficiency.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent that five minutes additional time be given to the gentleman.

There was no objection.

Mr. SPERRY. In that connection, Mr. Speaker, the information was furnished regularly from the different States and embraced, for the most part, at different times all of the States up to 1864, when the national system of banking in connection with the internal revenue system had seemed to make it unnecessary for State banks to render further reports.

Mr. HALL of Missouri, Will the gentlemen allow me to make

Mr. HALL of Missouri. Will the gentleman allow me to make a correction of his statement taken from this same document?

On page 4 I find this language:

The first report thereunder was made by Secretary McLane under date of February 12, 1833, and stated that returns had only been received from the governors of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Fennsylvania, Kentucky, Ohlo, North Carolina, Georgia, Indiana, and Arkansas, and that no reports had been received from the governors of the States of Connecticut, Rhode Island, New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, South Carolina, Tennessee, Louisiana. Mississippi, Illinois, Alabama, and Missouri.

Mr. SPERRY. Mr. Speaker, I stated, after reading the resolution, that thereafter reports had been received for the most part from all of the States, and that I believe to be absolutely true. I have not said, however, that these reports were received dur-ing the next year from all the States, for it would have been almost impossible, because at that time it is not true that all of the States had the information at hand ready to give. But it has been compiled from time to time, and the information is scattered through various public records and reports. It contains invaluable information; but it is inaccessible to any man unless he devotes his individual time to search for it.

If there is a subject on which the House needs information, and the debte displaces indeed the fact that it does need it.

the debate discloses indeed the fact that it does need it-even my friend from Tennessee needs information-I say if there is a question on which we need information it is as to the system and operation of State banking which existed previous to the adop-operation of State banking which existed previous to the adoption of the national system.

Mr. McMILLIN. If the gentleman will yield to me, as I desire to get some information, for I confess my need of it, I will ask the gentleman, while they were providing in this resolution to ascertain the rates of interest charged by State banks, the amounts lost by reason of the failure of State banks, and other information of the teleproperation of the same provided and the province of the same provided and the province of the same provided and the province of the same province of information of that character, why they did not also incorporate in the resolution a request that the Secretary of the Treasury should inform the House as to the rate of interest charged by national banks, and the losses that have been sustained by them or through them; also, whether they have paid their depositors in full, and what proportion have they paid them, and informain this, and what proportion have they paid them, and informa-tion of a similar character?

Mr. SPERRY. That part of the resolution to which the gentle-man from Tennessee refers, according to my best recollection, was attached to the original resolution by a friend of the State bank-ing system, who said he would vote for the repeal of the tax un-der all circumstances. And the only fault with the resolution is that it was amended by a man who claims to be a friend of the State banking system, and he is too sincere a man, in my judg-ment, to have attached that amendment, which occasions all of the delay now, for the sake of occasioning any delay in casting his vote for the repeal of the State-bank tax and the raising them up again. That is my answer to the gentleman.

I have already stated that the resolution is in my opinion I have already stated that the resolution is in my opinion somewhat more comprehensive than it need to have been. It is more comprehensive than the resolution of July 10, 1832, which I have just read. Under that resolution information has been furnished year by year by the Secretary of the Treasury down to 1864, and that information at least is information which have such the Hause cught to have; and I am likewise such that I am sure the House ought to have; and I am likewise sure that it is perfectly within the reach of the Secretary of the Treasury and can be furnished without unreasonable delay.

The trouble is just there, that the information Mr. OATES. on which we are to act can not be furnished within a reasonable length of time. This resolution is so comprehensive that it will take a great deal more time to furnish than the information required by the resolution of 1832.

Mr. SPRINGER. By no means. The information is more accessible now

Mr. SPERRY. Mr. Speaker, in response to the suggestion of the gentleman from Alabama, I will state that it is not my pur-pose to propose any amendment to this resolution. The resolution has been presented in good faith with a view of eliciting imtion has been presented in good faith with a view of eliciting important information. It is a resolution which commends itself, I am sure, to the judgment of the House. If, however, the chairman of the committee should see proper to suggest an amendment that this information shall be furnished to the House by the 1st day of December or the 1st day of January, or whatever time may suit the gentlemen now making their objections to the resolution on the second time it will be entirely acceptable. lution on the score of time, it will be entirely acceptable to me.
Mr. SPRINGER. I move the previous question upon the adoption of this resolution.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate may now consider the bill (H. R. 4177) to provide for further urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for other purposes. It is a very short bill, and will only take a few minutes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendment.

The first amendment was, on page 2, after line 13, to insert:

Light-house at Solomon's Lump, Virginia: That the Light-House Board be, and is hereby, authorized to use, so far as may be necessary, for the restablishment of the Solomon's Lump light-house, in addition to the amount appropriated therefor, any unexpended balance of the appropriation for the reconstruction of the Wolf Trap light-house that may remain after this last-named light-house shall have been rejectablished.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, after line 21, to insert:

World's Columbian Exposition: That a diploma of honorable mention may be conferred upon designers, inventors, and expert artisans who have assisted in the production and perfection of such exhibits as are awarded diplomas in the World's Columbian Exposition or are formally commended by the director-general thereof; and authority is hereby given to the Board of Lady Managers of the World's Columbian Commission, acting in conjunction with the Associated American Exhibitors, to present said diplomas of honorable mention to said designers, inventors, and expert artisans whenever a certificate is filed with said Board of Lady Managers by an exhibitor who has received a medal and diploma or the formal commendation of the director-general setting forth the name or names of designers, inventors, and expert artisans who have assisted in the production and perfection of the exhibits for which said medals and diplomas were awarded or commendation made, the aggregate expense thereof not to exceed $5.000, to be paid from the sum of $100.000 appropriated by an act approved March 3.180, making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30.1894, and for other purposes, for the payment of judges, examiners, and members of the committees to be appointed by the Board of Lady Managers as authorized by section 6 of an act approved April 25, 1890, authorizing the World's Columbian Exposition and appropriating money therefor.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, after line 55, to insert:

To pay clerks to Senators and per diem clerks to committees retained in the service of the Senate during the recess of the Fifty-first Congress, under resolution of the Senate of September 30, 1890, $22,088.

Mr. DOLPH. Before that amendment is adopted I wish to call the attention of the Senate to it. On the 30th day of September, 1890-

Mr. Jones of Nevada, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. Mongan on the 23th instant, reported the following substitute; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

"Resolved, That the per diem clerks to the committees of the Senate and the cierks to Senators be retained in the service of the Senate during the coming recess, and that the Secretary of the Senate is hereby authorized and directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the Senate the per diem now allowed such clerks by law during the sessions of the Senate."

It will be remembered that that session was very long; it did not terminate until the 1st day of October. The clerks of committees and secreturies of Senators, and everybody connected with the Senate had had a very long and tedious session, and the business of Senators had got in arrears and it was necessary for Senators to have clerical assistance here after the adjournment. For that reason the Senate adopted the resolution, and the per diem clerks and secretaries to Senators were retained in service.

It turned out that there was not a sufficient amount in the contingent fund to pay for the salaries of the clerks and secretaries. The first time the opportunity was offered the Senate placed upon an appropriation bill an amendment for the payment of the clerks and secretaries. It was a bill to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for public printing and binding for the first half of the fiscal year 1891, and for other purposes. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], who is a member of the Committee on Appropriations, in submitting the conference report on that bill, and stating that the other House refused to agree to the amendment for the payment of Senate clerks and secretaries, said:

ment for the payment of Senate clerks and secretaries, said:

The House conferees were so positive upon this matter and would yield to no suggestion on the part of the Senate conferees, that at last the Senate conferees, seeing that the important deficiencies in the bill were being held up and that the Public Printing Office was in trouble because of the delay gave way, but with the notification that the whole subject would come up again on the legislative appropriation bill, where an attempt will be made to settle the question upon the basis of a reasonable annual salary to these per diem clerks. I may add that any one who reads the RECORD will learn that when the report was presented in the other House it was there stated that members of the House must understand that this did not involve any permanent recession on the part of the Senate but that the House must be prepared to consider the question upon the next appropriation bill.

It is for these reasons that the majority of the conferees on the part of the Senate, being very desirous that the Printing Office should be relieved from its trouble and that this appropriation bill should go through, gave way for the present. The whole matter will come up, undoubtedly, on the legislative appropriation bill, and in the next deficiency appropriation bill the particular items that are out here will be considered more fully in connection with other deficiencies. I do not think it wise to prolong the contest upon this bill in view of the condition of the Printing Office.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], a member of the

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], a member of the committee, said:

I desired the Senator in charge of the conference report to make the explanation, because I was unable as a member of the conference committee to agree to the report, for the reasons stated, that I felt that the Senate Is under a moral and legal obligation to provide the funds for the payment of the clerks who were employed between the adjournment of the last session on the 1st of October and the beginning of the pres nt session. They have performed the service and are entitled to compensation for it; and in the absence of the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. Allison], I declined to agree to the conference report. I amglad the question is to be kept up in the form the conference report. I shall not, therefore, antagonize this particular report.

The Senate Committee on Appropriations did, in a subsequent bill, as I recollect, place this amendment and it was agreed to by the Senate, but it was lost in conference.

The pending bill, I understand, provides means to pay clerks of members of the other branch of Congress, and it appears to me as a very appropriate bill upon which to place this matter. I am very glad the Committee on Appropriations have reported the amendment. I hope it will be adopted, and when it is adopted

I hope it will be insisted on.

I consider it as dishonest for the Senate longer to decline to pay this compensation. I regard it not only as a legal and moral obligation, as stated by the Senator from Missouri, but I feel Congression of the state of the occasion, many of the young men who stayed here and performed this duty borrowed money, as I happen to know, to pay their expenses during the time, and they have never yet been able to

Mr. HALE. As the Senator from Oregon quoted from something which I said in a previous Congress when this provision was considered, I merely want to say to him that he does not need to give himself any trouble about the attitude of the Senate in this matter. It has committed itself more than once to this proposition. But the trouble will lie in another body. All that can be expected is that the representatives of the Senate in conference will uphold the wishes of the body to every reasonable extent. I shall hope that when it comes up in conference the other House will yield; but if there is any trouble it will be there, not here.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, I have some knowledge of the point which is under discussion and have had from the start. I most heartily concur in the views expressed by the Senator from Oregon. I know there was great injustice and inequity practiced toward certain employés of this body. If there is anything on which the Senate, as any other deliberative body, should keep its honor clear and its contracts sound and pure it is in re-keep its honor clear and its contracts sound and pure it is in regard to those whom we employ here in our service.

I not only express my appreciation to the Committee on Appropriations, but earnestly hope that they will find it in their power to enforce with the other branch of Congress our rights. There has been a good deal of talk recently about Senatorial rights. One of the highest rights of this body is to pay its employes honestly for the work they perform. That is one of the rights which I hope will never be yielded under any circumstances.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

MODEL BATTLESHIP ILLINOIS.

With the leave of the Senator from Indiana-

Mr. VOORHEES. Certainly.
Mr. HALE. I report from the Committee on Naval Affairs a joint resolution, and I ask that it may be put upon its passage. The joint resolution (S. R. 36) transferring the exhibit of the Navy Department, known as the model battleship Illinois, to the State of Illinois, as a naval armory for the use of the naval mil-itia of the State of Illinois on the termination of the World's Columbian Exposition, was read twice by its title.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there is no objection the joint resolution is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and will be read at length.

Mr. HARRIS. I did not understand the Senator from Maine to ask that the bill be now considered.

Mr. HALE. Yes; I take it that it will give rise to no debate.

Mr. HARRIS. I beg to say to the Senator that I think the bill as reported had better be printed and go over until the next legislative day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?
Mr. HALE. After a little explanation perhaps the Senator will not insist upon its going over.

Mr. HARRIS. I have not interposed an objection, but I make the suggestion to the Senator. I confess that I should like to see the bill in print, and I should like to know upon what exact ground it is that we are to turn over a naval vessel, if it be a vessel of the navy, to any one of the States of the Union.

Mr. HALE. I will tell the Senator. First, I ask the Secretary to read the joint resolution as reported. Then the Senator will see what it includes.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That on the termination of the World's Columbian Exposi-tion at Chicago, Ill., in November. 1893, the exhibit of the Navy Department of the United States Government, better known as the model battleship Illinois, a facsimile of the battleships Indians, Massachusetts, and Oregon, with such of her boats, equipments, and appurtenances now on exhibition as the Secretary of the Navy shall deem proper be, transferred to the State of Illinois as a naval armory for the use of the naval militia of the State of Illinois. Provided, That such articles as may or have been loaned by the various bureaus of the Navy Department, the United States Marine Corps, the Naval Academy, and Hydrographic Office be not included in the said transfer, except as hereinbefore provided.

Mr. HALE. First, the reason why I should like the joint resolution to pass to-day is that it must go to the other House and be passed there, and it ought all to be done before the Exposition closes. The Senator knows that is only a few days ahead. In answer to his objection that it is turning over a buttleship,

I will state that it is only a model. It is not removable. It is built of brick and mortar, simply as a design, a facsimile of a battleship. It is of no use to the Government.

Mr. HARRIS. It is not a ship at all, then?
Mr. HALE. Not at all. It is simply a brick model.
Mr. HARRIS. I have nothing further to ask in the way of explanation.

Mr. HALE. I knew the moment I explained it to the Senator it would satisfy him. I have sent to the have received the following dispatch: I have sent to the Navy Department and

The Department sees no objection to turning over the model battleship Illinois when the Exposition is over and the exhibits on board have been re-moved therefrom.

So nobody objects, and I hope the joint resolution will pass.

Mr. MANDERSON. Ido not wonder at the very natural mistake made by the Senator from Tennessee, because of the language of the joint resolution, which says that this is "a facsimile of the battleships Indiana," etc. It certainly is not a facsimile. It may be a base imitation; a pile of brick; it is not a facsimile. The language ought to be changed.

Mr. HALE. The old definition that used to be given in the spelling book the Senator and I studied in our boyhood days was that a facsimile is a close imitation; and this is as close an imithat a facsimile is a close imitation; and this is as close an imitation as can be got out of brick and mortar. We are very glad to get rid of it; the Illinois people are very glad to take it for what it is worth; and I suppose nobody will object.

Mr. CULLOM. If I may be allowed simply to say one word, I will state that this ship, as it is called, is built of brick and mortar and possibly some timber, but it would be of no earthly value to anybody if turned over to the Department, except for the materials that might be gotten out of it; and probably it would cost more to do that than the materials would bring.

There is a naval reserve, an Illinois naval militia so called.

There is a naval reserve, an Illinois naval militia, so called, in our State, which could utilize this model as a sort of a head-quarters, perhaps to some purpose, and it would be of very much interest to the people of the Western country. The ship as it stood there has attracted almost as much attention as anything else connected with the great Exposition, and it is felt by the people in the West that it would be a matter of interest if it should remain there.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator will allow me, as I started this muss, I will say that I am not only willing to turn over the model to the State of Illinois, but if the Senator desires it, I think I would agree to pay the State something to take it off our hands.

Mr. CULLOM. We do not ask any money on that account,

Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. VOORHEES introduced a bill (S. 1135) granting a pension to Mrs. Katharine Todd Crittenden; which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PURCHASE OF SILVER BULLION.

PURCHASE OF SILVER BULLION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R.1) to repeal a part of an act approved July 14, 1890, entitled "An act directing the purchase of silver bullion and the issue of Treasury notes thereon, and for other purposes," the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. PERKINS.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, yesterday we voted upon that amendment to the bill which would give usfree coinage. It was lost, a great majority of the Senate voting against it. All other amendments will meet a like fate. They are only good in that they are better than unconditional repeal, and it seems fille to go through the form of voting upon them. I am indifferent whether I vote upon them or not. Some of them have been introduced by Senators who intend voting for unconditional repeal, and their amendments may save for them something of the appearance of amendments may save for them something of the appearance of things. Nobody is really deceived, however, as to who are the friends of bimetallism. The course of debate and the vote of yesterday have given us the names, and these additional roll calls but serve to emphasize the defeat which the cause of silver has suf-

The fight for silver has failed because Democratic support and Republican encouragement have been withdrawn.

The true situation has never been understood by the public; it has never developed on this floor; it has never been exposed to

There has been talk of closure, and Senators across the Chamber have leaped into sudden reputation by advocating it; have posed as if they were each a Columbus discovering some new land, or an ingenious and adventurous spirit who had found a clew to the Senate maze; they are lauded by a metropolitan press as men who were to be saviors of their country, and unsavory criticism and bitter denunciation have changed and blended into acclamations and praise.

Why, Mr. President, even the newest Senator here must have understood perfectly that closure as applicable to this measure was an impossibility; that it could find no foothold or abiding place in this Chamber. These arguments have been for the gallery, for a gullible public.

For my own part I should be delighted to see it enacted. We have from the first invited a vote upon its adoption. The majority will need it later. It will not be so ardently pressed by this side of the Chamber in the winter months when the repeal of the election law and tariff revision come up for passage. When that of the Chamber in the winter months when the repeal of the election law and tariff revision come up for passage. When that delectable time shall come the silver State Senators will no longer be the "goats." While we may not be able to emulate the subserviency recently displayed by this side toward the Administration, we shall hope to exhibit our earnest desire for progress in legislation by taking to heart the lesson which has been taught us, and by lending our presence at all hours for a green and a vote. quorum and a vote.

The open and avowed sentiment of the large majority of this body is against the introduction here of the previous question or of any other form of closure. That majority believes that the privilege of free discussion is a safeguard which should not be removed, and that while delays may arise because of the right of unlimited debate, yet the sum of the gain it brings is infinitely greater than any inconvenience which may be occasioned. does the dignity of the Senate suffer by this right of debate. This Senate loses its dignity, Mr. President, whenever it becomes the simple mouthpiece of the Executive will, and when it yields to influences which should have no share in shaping leg-

No, Mr. President, it may as well be understood that the vaporings here and elsewhere about closure have had no sort of influence on the result of this debate; and I state without fear influence of the result of that nobody who has advocated it had the slightest idea that it would pass, even if there should have been no discussion respecting the proposed change in the rules.

been no discussion respecting the proposed change in the rules. Ever since this measure was first reported, the opposition to it has been based solely upon the belief that unconditional repeal, unaccompanied by affirmative legislation, would bring suffering and disaster to the whole country, and not upon the destruction of the welfare and prosperity of the silver States only, which would necessarily follow the passage of the bill. It was from the outset distinctly understood that if the support of friends on the other side of the Chamber should be withdrawn, while we felt that an irreparable wrong would be inflicted upon us by unconditional repeal, we should nevertheless cease to oppose the vote. The time has come when we are left alone. Party exigency and other controlling motives have led to an acquiescence by the other side in the inevitable result. There is not the slightest criticism to be offered to such a conclusion. For two months we have fought together for the maintenance of the double standard, and we have lost.

Some of the criticism to which we have been subjected by Democratic Senators is misplaced. We have been told by some of them that our course has been obstructive and revolutionary. This sounds droll to those of us who witnessed the contest over the force bill. Senators who are vaguely understood now to favor closure, and who have denounced us, filed out solemnly, again and again, into the cloak rooms, or ensconced themselves in committee rooms to avoid aiding to make a quorum. That struggle lasted as long as has this, and the organization of speakers and the machinery of contest were periectly equipped and oiled. A Senator on the other side has spoken critically of the speech of the Senator from Nebraska because it occupied fifteen hours. I remember one speech on the force bill, that of the Senator from West Virginia, which consumed twelve hours. The distinction between the two is slight, and the able address of the Senator from Nebraska will not suffer by comparison with any other, long or short, which has been uttered in this Senate.

I do not refer to these force-bill days by way of criticism, but only to emphasize the fact that fine distinctions breed nice differences, and to insist that in view of the few months that have passed since that somewhat memorable event, and the character of that contest, the utterances of some of the Southern Senators have been uncalled for and out of place. Most of them stood nobly by their Western brothers, but a few of them developed bitter hostility towards our section and our interests. We who are from States where silver is produced claim and have claimed no especial consideration growing out of the fate of that measure, but I confess we had expected that the struggle for very existence which we have made on this floor would bring us sympathy and not denunciation from representatives of a section which not long ago made an appeal on similar grounds, and did not make it in vain. I have not been many years in public life, Mr. President, but I have been here long enough to hear us denounced by certain Southern Senators as obstructionists, because we stood for the vital interests of our people, as well as for what we conceived to be for the interests of the whole country; long enough to hear it proposed that the doors of the Senate should be opened to expel a Senator who, in the exercise of his constitutional rights, sought by withholding his vote to postpone, if only for a day, the dire suffering which must be inflicted upon his State by the passage of this bill.

One Senator attempted to hold up the Senator from Kansas to ridicule, and told us that those of us who stood for the double standard were following that Senator and the doctrines of his party. Mr. President, the Populist party hold tenets to which I can not lend my approval, and many of its doctrines seem to me to be wild and visionary. I would infinitely rather stand, however, in the place of the Senator from Kansas than in that of the Senator who made him the target for his derision. The Senator from Kansas, at least, swears in the words of no master, "nullius addictus jurare in verba magistri." Nor has he felt called upon to recant the utterances of former years, or found it expedient to change front on this great question. And however much some of us may hereafter differ with the Senators who belong to the Populist party, the sincerity and courtesy and ability which they have displayed in this contest entitle them to the gratitude and esteem and respect of every man who believes that the prosperity of our country must rest upon the standard of silver as well as of gold.

The course and period of this debate, long as it has been, have been supported from its commencement by a majority of this Chamber. There has never been a moment when we have not been encouraged to continue by a clear preponderance in numbers of the members of this body. Democratic Senators have told us that they must vote against us, but that we must win in the end. Over here on this side we have been assured that threatened interference with the tariff was the real cause of existing troubles. For a time we were encouraged to act as a buffer to the threatened appearance of the bill to repeal the election law, and throughout there has been hope that we might succeed in order that while the struggle lasted the inability of succeed in order that while the struggle lasted the inability of the Democracy, the dominant party, to control the action of the Senate might be used to its discredit; and that should a settlement be forced odium might be cast upon the Democratic party for suffering or permitting it. Except, however, as we might be used as an instrument of party political success in the Eastern States, we have been, with the exception of the support of the courageous Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON], absolutely friendless on this side of the Chamber, and all talk of symmathy for our section has been a pretense and a sham. sympathy for our section has been a pretense and a sham.

When there is a national election we are coddled and considered; we are invariably given a beautiful plank in the party platform, and in national conventions we are treated with consideration. At all other times, and on all other occasions, our interests are treated with contempt. When some question of the tariff arises we are urged to stand with the party which made labor free and seeks to ennoble it. When some mud bar at tide water in Connecticut or Oregon or Delaware is to be removed, or some unknown estuary of the sea made navigable, we are urged to stand by the flag and an appropriation. When we hesitate about the exclusion of foreign-builtships from home protections. whenever the welfare of our own States is involved we are treated with contumely and disdain. Out of all the millions of annual appropriations no dollar blesses our great section, and now you are to deprive it of its chief industry because a contracted currency appeals to Eastern greed and meets British approval. We are not to be driven from the Republican party. We believe that we stand for its truest principles; but for one I am tired, heartily tired, of the policy which is being followed of using us when we are needed and treating the reasonable and proper claims of our people with soorn and neglect. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The immediate contest, Mr. President is practically ended, and the purchasing clause of the Sherman act will be unconditionally repealed. The real struggle has only begun, however, and will not end until silver shall be rehabilitated as a money metal and a standard of value. Some of us may give place to others as the fight progresses, but whoever shall represent our States will stand ready to sacrifice everything that life holds dear in the battle for the interests of the people.

For Colorado these are grave days. I speak only for my own State. I am advised that an adjoining State, Wyoming, desires repeal. The Senator from Minnesota made proffer of its vote, and his authority has not been questioned. But I know my own people, and I know as no other member of this Senate except my colleague can know, the import and meaning to Colorado of the vote which shall be had upon this measure. We came into the Union of States in the centennial year, and in the galaxy of Commonwealths we are usually known as the Centennial State. We were fitted for statehood by population and resources. Our people came from all the States in the Union; they found a desert; they have made it a garden. They were encouraged to search for the precious metals, and they poured millions of gold and silver into your Treasury. They built cities, founded schools and colleges, erected churches, and established happy and peaceful and contented homes.

lished happy and peaceful and contented homes.

The action you contemplate is as if you should take a vast and fertile area of Eastern lands, destroy the structures upon it, and sow the ground with salt, that it might never again yield to the hand of the husbandman. These are indeed grave and sad days for us. Your action drives our miners from their homes in the mountains, and compels the abandonment of hamlets and of towns that but yesterday were prosperous and populous. We shall turn our hands to new pursuits and seek other means of livelihood. We shall not eat the bread of idleness, and under the shadow of our eternal hills we breed only good citizens. The wrong, however, which you are inflicting upon us is crueland unworthy, and the memory of it will return to vex you. Out of the misery of it all, her representatives in this Senate will be always glad to remember that they did their duty as God gave them the vision to see it. [Applause in the galleries.]

all, her representatives in this Senate will be always glad to remember that they did their duty as God gave them the vision to see it. [Applause in the galleries.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair desires to remind occupants of the galleries that manifestations of approval or disapproval are in violation of the rules of the Senate, and if the offense be repeated it will be the duty of the Chair to have the galleries cleared.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the Senators from Colorado and the Senators from the other silver-producing States have my profound sympathy. Iam perhaps more familiar than most Senators with the region of country from which they come. I have traversed every State and Territory in what are known as the silver-mining regions; I have beheld and admired the grand scenery and the broad plains, and I could foresee the undeveloped resources of the future. I knew then, as I know now, that this magnificent country of ours, better, far better, than the mountain country of Europe, was destined to be a great, growing, and powerful portion of our nation.

I admire the ability, the tenacity, and the courage with which the Senators from that region have conducted this contest, as they call it, for their local interest, the interest of silver mining. No man questions their ability, no man could either have heard or read the appeal made last evening by the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. Teller] or the eloquence of my young friend on my right [Mr. Wolcott], in behalf of the interest of

If this were a thing which could be granted by favor; if this were a question which did not seriously involve the greatest interests of our country, we should willingly yield to their appeals, and grant them all they ask. The cost of their silver would be comparatively nothing to the Government of the United States. It is only because we believe that the further purchase of silver and making it the standard of value in our country would work irreparable injury to the business of the whole country, and to the wages and property of every citizen of the land, that we can not respond to their wishes. We believe that to adopt the policy they propose would be to degrade our money by lowering its purchasing power and producing all the dire results which have been nointed out.

sults which have been pointed out.

The debate on our side of this question has not been conducted insuch voluminous terms, and long speeches have not been presented; yet the ground of our opposition to the measures proposed in behalf of free coinage is not on account of our want of desire to do anything we can for our fellow Senators and for the States they represent; but it is because we believe we can not do it without sacrificing the interests of the entire people of the United States.

United States.

The silver mining interest, although important to the people whom these Senators represent in the mining region of the country, is not nearly as important as they think; it is a comparatively small industry; it does not compare with any of the great industries which underlie the riches and the wealth and the production of our country—cotton, corn, wheat, and the almost innumerable products I might name, which are immeasurably more valuable in their annual supply than silver can be.

After all, it is only fifty or sixty million ounces of silver which are yearly taken out of the earth, and it is that interest that we are appealed to to protect, even though in substituting that silver for the standard of money in our country we detach ourselves from all the commercial nations, separate ourselves and our standard of value from all the Christian people of the world except only in North and South America, and join the old nations, India and China and the South American States.

I beg the Senators who come from the silver-producing States to feel on this subject as I do. It is not that we desire to injure them; it is not that we do not admire their courage; we take pride in their efforts, but we think, on the whole, it is not wise to adopt silver as the standard of value and the only standard of value in this country.

Why, Mr. President, have not parties in the North and parties in the South, Senators Republican and Senators Democratic, joined in endeavoring to establish by experiment whether we could prevent the further depreciation of silver. We have had two experiments, which have cost the Government of the United States more than $100.000,000. If we should attempt to sell silver we have purchased under the laws I shall mention, we should lose out of the pockets of the people this enormous sum of money. Why? Because with all of our effort, with all of our experiments, with all the officers of the Government aiding them to the extent of their power, so far as I know, we have shown that it is impossible for the United States of America to prevent the depreciation of silver bullion, and it has gone steadily down, down, down, down.

The Bland-Allison act, as it was known, was an experiment in itself. For twelve years we continued that experiment with a constantly losing market year by year, and the article we bought depreciating in value. It was measured by millions and tens of millions. So at the end of that time we wanted to make another experiment in order to try another way by which we could prevent the depreciation of silver. We did it. The measure was called the Sherman law, although I was the last man on this side of the Chamber to agree to it, because I feared the experiment and feared that with the enormous purchase of 4,500,000 ounces of silver bullion a month we could not maintain the price of silver, but I yielded, because I wished to see the experiment tried. Idid hope and did believe that the purchase by the United States of all the silver mined in this country—for that was the amount of it—would prevent the depreciation of silver, but it did not. It depreciated more and more, and we lost more and more.

Two years after that act was passed, for which I voted, and against which every member on the other side of the Chamber voted, I saw that the experiment had been fairly tried and that we must stop purchasing silver or we should be stranded upon the single silver basis, detached from all the European nations, by having silver alone, a constantly depreciating commodity, or our hands in immense sums, forced to buy and to take all the silver of the world, and urged by the constant demand of Senators from the silver-producing States to attempt the free coinage of silver. They insisted, and the honorable Senator from Colorado [Mr. Teller], with the frankness which always characterizes him, while he voted for that bill, did not give up his claim and his demand for the free coinage of silver.

At the end of that two years I became satisfied that it was wrong to continue the purchase of silver bullion at this great loss. Other Senators around me were of the same opinion. I introduced a bill here with that end in view. It was voted against by all our friends on the other side of the Chamber. We are not, as I said the other day, new converts on this subject. We tried the experiment at the cost of many million dollars to the people of the United States. We tried to stop that experiment, and failed. We took our position long before Mr. Cleveland became President of the United States. But our friends on the other side were not satisfied. They thought the experiment ought to be continued.

Finally we met here, after failures which involved immense losses to our people, after the suspension of many branches of industry, arising, as they said, out of the fear that we would be compelled to continue our silver purchases and go to the single silver standard. We were told by the President of the United States that the first thing to be done was to stop the purchase of silver bullion. We had thought that two years ago and so voted. We were ready to say "Amen!" at once to the President of the United States, because that was coming to the position that we had occupied for the last two years. We were ready, therefore, to vote for the suspension of the purchase of silver bullion.

Then it was, while our friends around us here, who had been

Then it was, while our friends around us here, who had been standing for silver, said we were striking a blow at silver, after we had been buying more and more silver and losing more and more, until it was feared that the nation would become bankrupt by the continued purchase of silver bullion, and all our industries would be disturbed. What could we do? Must we go on and buy silver more and more, with the certainty that it would bring us to a single standard of silver? Feeling, as we have, that it was wronging our laboring people whose wages are now measured by the best kind of coin, coin of the highest value, we could not do otherwise, sir, than we have done.

I have sympathized with these gentlemen. I like them. I ad-My friend from Nevada [Mr. JONES] is full of ideas mire them. My friend from Nevada [Mr. JONES] is full of ideas floating airily upon the wing, and listening to him one could very easily fall in his wake. But now the stern fact remains that if we maintain the purchase of silver freely then we become a silver standard country, a monometallic state. But that they would not like at all. Gold would be hoarded and kept by all Christian and civilized nations of the world, and by far the greatest power now upon this little globe of ours, the United States of America, composed of free men, women, and children, with all its boundless resources, must follow the example of these states that are not so rich, not so populous, not so powerful as we.

What was the best thing to be done? We sympathized with these gentlemen when they told us their troubles. God knows I do, and that I will do anything to help them. But I do believe now that as the result of the suspension of silver purchases, silver will be used more and more and ought to be used more and We have now $677,000,000, according to the statistics. of silver in existence in our country. We never had as much be-When coinage was free we never had over $50,000,000 of silver in existence at one time. Now we have $677,000,000 in sight. Have we not done that much towards helping them? Can we do more?

I think we could do more. I believe that by a free issue of what are called the minor coins, or the fractional coins, rather, we could probably float many millions more of silver bullion which could be used to the fullest extent possible, because that kind of coin can not go out of the country. It is freely taken by every man in this country not because it is not worth its value, gold value, but because it is convenient, the people desire it, and

There is the condition. If these Senators will only delay their jeremiads for awhile and wait a year or two, they will find that the end of the world has not come because we have stopped the coinage of silver; that silver mining will go on; that Colorado, with her undeveloped resources of gold, copper, lead, and many other metals, will prosper; and that the good people of Colorado, now frightened out of their wits because they have lost one of their industries, will find ample freedom for the exercise of their faculties in the development of their soil and in the development of their mines.

Sir, the United States of America ought to encourage every interest in every part of our country. But it ought not to en-courage those interests to the destruction of any interest of the people of the United States. I am one of those who believe in the broadest protection to every American industry. If I had my way I would, by reasonable tariff duties, build up every in-dustry in our country that could be carried on with safety and with profit. If silver-mining industry could be carried on without endangering the standard of value upon which all our commerce and industries rest, I should be very willing to see it carried on.

Mr. President, perhaps I have said all that is necessary to be I do not want our friends here on this side, or the Populists, with whom I do not agree, to feel hurt because we have not been converted by their long speeches. Ido not complain of the length of their speeches, because I could always retire outside of the Chamber when I did not care to hear them. But, Mr. President, we can not indulge in any of these phantasies when the general interests of the people of the United States are involved. Nor will I now repeat the arguments in regard to the continued free coinage of silver and its disturbance of all the industries now existing and to be created, because that would be only renewing the debate.

There are, however, one or two things to which I desire especially to call the attention of Senators on the other side of the Chamber. I doubt very much whether the bill, when we pass it, will meet the expectations of many people who probably have made a bugaboo of the purchase of silver to disturb their dreams o' nights. I believe that it is necessary to superadd to this measure proposed by the honorable Senator from Indiana other measures even more vitally important than this. He does not desire, however, to have an amendment offered, and, after thinking the matter over and giving it careful attention, I believe it would not be wise to offer any proposition of a new character, raising other questions of doubt and dispute with reference to this bill, because this having been fairly discussed, there is now no longer any ground for argument upon this bill, and to introduce new subjects might open up new debate.

But it is absolutely necessary, in my judgment, that some legislation be had in reference to the fund on hand for the maintenance of resumption, and also to have a clear conception of that fund. I believe that the fund at this moment is used con-trary to the provisions of existing law. It is necessary, then, attention should be called to this subject.

The provisions of existing law are very familiar to me In 1875, after a stormy and tumultuous debate in both Houses of Congress, it was finally concluded that it was best to provide for the resumption of specie payments and bring our notes up to par in coin. Then a bill was passed, a copy of which I have before me, and which provided for the accumulation of gold coin and bullion in certain proportions up to a certain date. provided that in order to raise this fund the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to issue bonds of a certain kind and description, set out in the law, in the refunding act, as it was called Under that act the then Secretary of the Treasury did sell bonds to the amount of $95,000,000 in coin, and thus secured a fund as a basis for the maintenance of the resumption of United States notes, and for no other purpose whatever. For purposes of accuracy, I will read a portion of this law to the lawyers of the Senate, and call their attention to its construction:

And to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare and provide for the redemption in this act authorized or required, he is authorized to use any surplus revenues from time to time in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated, and to issue, sell, and dispose of, at not less than par, in coin either of the descriptions of bonds of the United States described in the act of Congress, approved July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," with like qualities, privileges, and exemptions, to the extent necessary to carry this act into full effect; and to use the proceeds thereof for the purposes aforesaid.

That is, for the purposes of maintaining our notes at par with coin. On the 1st of January, 1879, there was in the Treasury of the United States $140,000,000 with which to pay United States notes; $40,000,000 of this, however, was necessary for the current expenses of the Government. It has become the rule in the administration of a great Government like ours, that it is necessary always to have in the Treasury an amount of money sufficient for paying the expenses of a month. $30,000,000 or $40,000,000, whatever it may be, because, as the expenditures are not equally distributed throughout the year, sometimes it is necessary to have more on hand and sometimes less. This fund, called the resumption fund, was not only intended to maintain resumption, but it was a fund from which the ordinary expenses of the Government were drawn.

In 1882 Congress took up the matter and determined that it was wise to separate the resumption fund from the ordinary fund for the payment of current expenses. In a section which I have before me, passed in 1882, as an amendment to one of the appropriation bills, there is a provision that the resumption fund should consist of money received from the sale of bonds and should not exceed $100,000,000.

Mr. COCKRELL. What act is that? Mr. SHERMAN. The act of 1882. Here is the exact provi-

That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to receive old coin with the Treasurer or assistant treasurers of the United States, sums not less than $20, and to issue certificates therefor in denominations of not less than $20 each, corresponding with the denominations of United

Then there is this proviso:

Provided. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall suspend the issue of such gold certificates whenever the amount of gold coin and gold bullion in the Treasury reserved for the redemption of United States notes falls below $100,00,000.

Although this is somewhat blind in its language, yet it has always been construed by the Treasury Department that this is a fund specially set aside for the maintenance of the resumption of specie payments, and can not be used for any other purpose whatever.

A question arose in the last Congress upon the construction of this act. The question was referred to the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives, and I find, in a report made by Mr. CULBERSON, on behalf of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House, a report reciting the facts I have already stated, in which he reports to the committee that no portion of this $100,000,000 derived from the sale of bonds could be used for any other purpose whatever except to maintain the payment of United States notes.

Mr. TELLER. I ask the Senator if the late Secretary, Mr. Foster, did not declare that it could be used for any purpose, and whether the Senator does not understand that that decision was made after reference of the question to the Attorney-General?

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I have inquired for that opinion of the Attorney-General, and I do not think it was made. Indeed, I have been informed by a member of the Senate that the present Attorney-General, who has been quoted with reference to the question, has declared that there was no such opinion.

ence to the question, has declared that there was no such opinion. I know of no such opinion.

Mr. TELLER. I do not know what the late Attorney-General did. I know that Mr. Foster so held it. I do not know whether he consulted the Attorney-General, but it was reported that he

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know about that; but, of course, Mr. Shekkalak. I do not know about that; but, of course, Mr. Foster not being a lawyer nor familiar with the construction of law, the opinion of the Attorney-General would have great weight with him. I have never seen such an opinion as the Senator refers to. If the Senator from Colorado or any one else has, I should like to see it.

In my judgment the language is so clear that there ought to be no controversy. Here is this report from the Committee on the Judiciary of the House, submitted by Mr. CULBERSON, which sets the question out in the strongest way, and among the quotations made by that committee in regard to this matter, I see in this report a quotation from Mr. ALLISON, who was here at the time that the bill was passed, in which his opinion is distinctly given that the money could not be used for any other purpose except the redemption of United States notes

Bayard's opinion is also quoted, and I read this for the benefit of my friends on the other side:

Mr. Bayand. But it can not be too emphatically stated and repeated that that gold was bought with bonds of the United States for one purpose, and one purpose only. It was to procure and to maintain resumption, and if it be used for anything else, it is a perversion of the fund and a breach of the

That was Mr. Bayard's opinion on the subject. I see, also, in the report the opinions of others quoted. Therefore, the committee reported that this fund is a sacred fund for this purpose only, that is, for the redemption of United States notes, whether made up of proceeds of bonds sold or from the surplus revenue, or both.

Mr. President, under the provisions of the law as it now stands, and with this construction upon it, there is no doubt whatever that this fund must remain intact in the Treasury and can not be taken for any purpose whatever without a breach of law.

I am told, perhaps in conformity with the practice adopted by Mr. Foster—whether that is so or not I do not know—that this fund is now being used to pay ordinary current expenses of the Government. It must be manifest to Senators on the other side that if that practice is continued long, if it be not promptly arrested by wise legislation, the hopes of those who believe in sound money and the maintenance of a specie standard will fall from under them. That fund ought to be restored and made intact. It is now reduced, I believe, to about $83,000,000, and at one time it was $81,000,000. It ought to be at once supplemented by gold. How? By the sale of bonds. That is a very delicate question with some Senators.

Mr. COCKRELL. To whom will the bonds be sold?
Mr. SHERMAN. They will be sold to our own people. I will wager everything I have in the world that within five days after the beginning of the issue of a popular loan at 3 per cent, running only for three years, it would be taken. The people of this country, men who have doubts about the fidelity or of the ability of banks to pay, will seize upon these small bonds or small certificate and the second of the second o did when their country was involved in financial danger.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question before he leaves that point of his argument?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. VEST. One clause of the so-called Sherman act provides that it is the policy of this Government to maintain the parity between gold and silver metals. Now suppose that in the exigencies of finance it became necessary to maintain the parity between cies of finance it became necessary to maintain the parity between the gold and silver metals, and there were no other means available except to use this so-called gold reserve, would not the Secretary of the Treasury have the right to do it?

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I will answer frankly. I say that the law of 1875, which provides for this fund, has not been changed by subsequent law. There is no language in any subsequent iaw that seeks to change it, or which points out any change in it. This fund was set aside in pursuance of the resumption act. The bonds were sold. They were set aside in the Treasury, and there have been held intact ever since. There is no subsequent law that has any reference whatever to it except no subsequent law that has any reference whatever to it except the one I have stated here, of 1882. There is no law whatever that has any reference to this fund in any of the various acts that have been passed on the subject.

I shall be very glad now to have the opinion of the Senator from Missouri, or the judicial opinion of this Senate, with reference to these laws as they stand, but I have given the best construction that I can give to them. However, it has been so long since I practiced law that perhaps I have forgotten how to construct law.

Mr. VEST. I hope the Senator from Ohio will acquit me of taking any issue with him as to the construction of the act of 1875. I put the question to him because when the Secretary of the Treasury paid out gold upon what are called bullion notes, I put the question to him because when the Secretary of giving the option to the holder of the notes as to what coin he should receive, the defense for that action was based upon the clause of the Sherman act to which I have alluded. I agree with the Senator from Ohio that under the act of 1875 the purposes of that reserve were specifically marked out, and I do not believe that the clause of the Sherman act to which I have alluded conthat the clause of the Sherman act to which I have alluded constructively repealed any part of the act of 1875.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is the construction I put upon it.

Mr. VEST. But I want the Senator from Ohio to state his opinion, because that is the defense made to the action of the Treasury Department in paying outgold at the option of the holder upon these bullion notes.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Paradiant there is not the second of the

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, there is another question that has arisen in regard to the construction of these laws, and that is whether the Secretary of the Treasury can sell now any of the bonds provided for in the refunding law for any purpose whatever except the maintenance of United States notes at par with gold.

Upon that I have a very clear conviction, and I appeal to every lawyer here whether I am right or not. Every lawyer here must pass upon it. Suppose the Secretary of the Treasury had been authorized under existing law to provide money to make good this reserve, for instance, how could he do it? Where is the money? How can he get it? The only law that authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds is the law to which I have already adverted. That law authorizes him to issue 4 per cent thirty-year bonds, or 4½ per cent fifteen-year bonds, or 5 per cent bonds running ten years. But the authority to issue them was specifically for the purpose of maintaining resumption upon United States notes. There has been no alteration of that law. Now, I should like any lawyer here to tell me whether by any act that has passed since that time there is the slightest provision that can be construed into an authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to sell these bonds except for the purpose of maintaining the payment of United States notes. Therefore, if you leave the Secretary in the present condition of affairs un-Upon that I have a very clear conviction, and I appeal to every if you leave the Secretary in the present condition of affairs unarmed with authority to borrow money upon the credit of the United States, you neglect your public duty when it has been plainly called to your attention. I say myself, as a lawyer, that, under existing law, there is no power to sell the three classes of bonds, or either of them, except for the purpose of securing gold enough with which to redeem United States notes.

Then I say further that no Secretary of the Treasury would dare to issue either of those classes of bonds even if the law permitted him to do it.

mitted him to do it.

Mr. BKACKBURN. Will the Senator from Ohio permit me a question ?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Is it not true that not one, but two At-Mr. BLACKBORN. Is in not true that not one, but two Arterneys-General have taken a different view, and have held that the Treasury Department has the authority to sell those bonds?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think not. I said here a moment agoperhaps the Senator from Kentucky was not in at the time—

Mr. BLACKBURN. I heard the Senator's reply to the question of the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator from Kentucky can find me or refer me to any such opinion I shall be very glad to have it put in at this point.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I know that it is understood that the late Attorney-General did during the administration of Secre-tary Foster hold that the power of the Secretary for the sale of these bonds to make good the deficit in this gold reserve fund of $100,000,000 existed.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, but my friend from Kentucky will see that no Secretary of the Treasury has dared to exercise that power. Not a single dollar of those bonds has been sold for any purpose except for the purpose I have named.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I admit that there has been no exercise of the power. I concur in the opinion of the Senator from Ohio. I deny that the Treasury Department at this time under existing law has any such authority. But the question with me was as to whether the last Attorney-General did not, under the administration of Secretary Foster, hold that the power for the sale of these bonds existed.

Mr. SHERMAN. That I can not answer, for I do not know.

I have not looked into it.

Here is the situation. It is now stated on both sides of the Chamber that there is no power in the Secretary of the Treasury to issue any kind of bonds which any Secretary would issue even if he had the power to do so. What Secretary of the Treasury would dare issue a thirty-year bond at 4 per centwhen we can easily get money at 3 per cent?

If he should attempt to sail the bonds at a premium, then nobody except the capitalist who looked long ahead as to the value of accruing interest would be able to purchase them. They could not be distributed among our people. Our banks could not use them at all, because they could not afford to pay the high pre-mium and issue only 90 per cent of notes. Our plain people mium and issue only 90 per cent of notes. Our plain people would look at a bond if it was running for three years and say, "I can keep it for a while and after a while buy a house for my wife and children." There is the difficulty. Any man who will attempt to sell those bonds now would meet with difficulties that could not be overcome.

Now, I have seen in newspapers, and I am tired of it, much said about the President of the United States doing this or do-ing that in regard to financial matters. The President of the United States is not usually invested with any power over these financial questions. From the beginning of our Government to this hour the powers conferred by Congress to deal with money questions have always been given to the Secretary of the Treasury. You do not find the name of the President in these laws. The President is not usually designated to exercise financial power. It is delegated by the Congress of the United States to the Secretary of the Treasury, who reports to Congress direct, and not through the President.

Mr. BUTLER. May I inquire of the Senator from Ohio if the present Secretary of the Treasury has asked for the authority which he is claiming he ought to have?

Mr. SHERMAN. I would not like to answer that.

Mr. BUTLER. It must be public.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think he has asked it. I can say he does not ask it now.

Mr. BUTLER. It must be a matter of public record, I should think, if he has asked it or communicated it to Congress.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know of any record which contains his opinion on the subject; and it would be a very delicate matter for the Secretary of the Treasury to attempt to originate that idea when the Congress of the United States is the proper place for it.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to ask the Senator a question. Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly. Mr. TELLER. Would there be any impropriety in the Secretary of the Treasury, if he thought it was necessary to sell bonds, to address a communication to Congress on that subject?

Mr. SHERMAN. Not at all.
Mr. TELLER. Would it not be a proper thing for him to do if he thought he ought to sell bonds? · Mr. SHERMAN. I think the Secretary of the Treasury never volunteered such a thing; at least I do not know of any case in the history of our Government where he has done it; but always Congress has called on the Secretary for his opinion on the subject, as we could now call on him. The Senator might call for his opinion on that subject by offering a resolution.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to ask the Senator from Ohio another question. If there is a deficiency in the revenues now, and likely to be in the future, is not that a proper subject for the President of the United States to address Congress on, under the constitutional provision that he shall inform Congress as to the condition of the country, etc.?

Mr. SHERMAN. That has not usually been done. Perhaps the Senator overlooked it, but this information has been already communicated to the Committee on Finance. It called on the Secretary of the Treasury to inform it as to the alleged deficiency, how much it is, etc., and that has been printed.

Mr. TELLER. What I ask is whether the President, in the exercise of a proper power conferred on him by the Constitution to keep Congress advised as to the condition of the country, could not make such a recommendation to Congress?

Mr. SHERMAN. He can do it, of course. But the Senator has been a Cabinet officer, and is probably aware that all questions of finance are dealt with directly by Congress on conference with the Secretary of the Treasury. I do not now recall a single instance in which the President of the United States additional Congress are reported in his annual measure when a distinct dressed Congress except in his annual message upon a distinct financial question. That has always been a matter of communication between the Secretary of the Treasury and the two Houses. I know when I had the honor to hold that office I was summoned often, very often indeed, in the nature of a witness before the committees of Congress, and I was very willing to go.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from Ohio can not have forgotten that in the last message the President of the United States sent to Congress he devoted himself exclusively to the financial question.

As a matter of course, when calling an extra session, he would communicate to Congress, by the Constitution, the cause of that call.

Mr. BUTLER. I think under the Constitution he is required to do it from time to time, if he thinks proper to do so.

Mr. SHERMAN. I say there is no question about his power.

He can address Congress upon any subject at any time, and necessarily when he calls Congress in extra session he would give them the reasons for that call, and if they happen to be financial, well and good, it makes no difference. But I say as a practice, as a rule, in all communications about appropriations, we have never asked the President whether it would be well to appropriate the president whether it would be selected. propriate money for a saw mill up in Minnesota or somewhere or anything of that kind. As a matter of course it goes through the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not want to annoy the Senator from Ohio in reference to the question I submitted to him a few moments ago; but whilst the Senator from Ohio is denying that under existing law the power for issuance of bonds to maintain the gold reserve fund of $100,000,000 exists, and whilst I am agreeing with the Senator from Ohio in his construction of the law, what I wanted to get at is this: Does the Senator know that during the last Administration that power was held to exist in the Treasury Department, and that upon the then Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Foster, of Ohio, asking the opinion of the Attorney. General, does the Senator from Ohio now know that that At. torney-General prepared an opinion, which was not promulgated. but upon which the then Secretary of the Treasury acted, to the extent of having the plates made from which the bonds were to be printed, and that those plates were prepared in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and are there now, but that the bonds were not issued, not because of any denial of the authority to issue them, but simply because Mr. Harrison, the President, declined to have it done, after they had gone that far?

Does the Senator know that the Secretary of the Treasury called upon the Attorney-General for an opinion, and acting upon the Attorney-General's advice he had prepared and made the plates, and that those plates are now in existence in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, showing, if that be true, that the last Administration did hold and did believe that the power for the issuance of bonds for this purpose existed?

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I do not know of that.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then, Mr. President, I will say that I do.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator says so, it is no doubt correct.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I know it to be true.
Mr. SHERMAN. But I do not know it myself; and if the Senator says that is the true situation, I think he ought to call upon the present Secretary for a formal opinion.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask the Senator if he feels at liberty to answer, without annoyance, whether he himself was not consulted on that very subject at that time?

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir; I never was.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then I will say to the Senator that a subpæna duces tecum served upon the Superintendent of the Bueau of Engraving and Printing will bring those plates to this Chamber within an hour.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should think the Committee on Finance would be very glad to see them.

Now, Mr. President—

Mr. TELLER. I do not want to interrupt the Senator, but I wish to call his attention to the Constitution as to the power of the President. It seems to me that if this matter comes to us it can come, and ought to come, from the President. tution says that-

He shall from time to time give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient.

Mr. SHERMAN. No one denies that he has the right by the Constitution of the United States. I certainly have not done it. I will agree with that. All I said was that a custom has grown up, which I believe goes back to the time of Alexander Hamilton, probably originating with him, that nearly all communications upon financial subjects, and I do not know of any notable exceptions, come from the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from Ohio let me make a suggestion?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will give up the floor entirely.

Mr. ALDRICH. No; I merely want to make a remark as to

Mr. ALDRICH. No. 1 merely want to make a remark as to the suggestion made by the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not understand the Senator from Ohio to deny that the power exists in the Secretary of the Treasury to sell bonds for the redemption of United States notes.

Mr. BLACKBURN. No.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not understand the Senator from Ohio to deny that proposition; and as I understand the opinions of the different Attorneys-General to which the Senator has alluded, they were simply that the Secretary of the Treasury had the power, under the act of 1875, to sell bonds for the maintenance of a reserve fund to redeem United States notes. Now, whether the Secretary of the Treasury has the power to sell bonds to redeem other notes is the question which I understand the Senator from Ohio to raise.

Mr. BLACKBURN. With the permission of the Senator from Ohio, I should like to answer the Senator from Rhode Island.
Mr. SHERMAN. I am disposed to give up the floor and let other Senators proceed.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then I want to say, in response to the suggestion of the Senator from Rhode Island, that I understand during the last Administration, towards the close of that Administration, when the proposition for the issuance of bonds was being considered by the then Secretary of the Treasury, it was not with a view of providing a fund to redeem the notes of the Government, but a raid had been made under that Administration ernment, but a rath had been made under that Administration upon the reserve fund of $100,000,000, and Mr. Secretary Foster proposed to issue bonds to make good that deficit and bring the reserve up to $100,000,000, where the law put it, and he called upon the then Attorney-General for an opinion as to the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to issue the bonds, whether 4 per cent or 44 or 5 per cent, under the law of 1875, and the Attorney-General gave his opinion (that opinion never having been promulgated for reasons that I have just stated) and assured the Secretary of the Treasury that he had the right to issue the Secretary of the Freatry that he had the right to issue the bonds, not to get money to redeem the outstanding notes of the Government, but to make good the deficit in the $100,000,000 gold reserve fund; that the plates had been prepared.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the Senator has gone as far as an ordinary interruption. I do not wish to be discourteous to the Senator, but I should like to go on.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I understood the Senator from Ohio to say that he had yielded the floor to the Senator from Rhode

Mr. SHERMAN. I thought of doing so.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I beg pardon; I should not have undertaken to interrupt any further if I had known the Senator still had the floor

Mr. SHERMAN. There is no doubt, and nobody questions the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to sell bonds to maintain the fund set apart for the redemption of United States notes. Nobody questions that. I said that at the beginning. But what I do say is that I do not believe any Attorney-General has made up his mind that the bonds can be sold for the purpose of carrying on the ordinary operations of the Government, and the fund can not be used for that purpose. That is all there is about it. The fund can not be reduced; it must be kept intact; and the Secretary must look to other sources of revenue, or he must stop the expenditures, or he must appeal to Congress.

Now, I have not said one word in criticism of the honorable

Secretary of the Treasury, who I believe is conscientiously doing his full duty; but I say that unless you give him further power he will be unable to meet the deficiency of $50,000,000 during the current year; and it is necessary as soon as possible, not to look to the old law of 1875, not to look to any extraordinary powers conferred for resumption purposes, but he must look to Congress for some authority to borrow money.

Mr. President, I was nearly through. I intended to offer an amendment, if it had been thought wise to offer any amendments to the bill, but I do not think now, under the circumstances, the bill, but I do not think now, under the circumstances, it is wise. It is better to let the amendments fall and let the bill, which has been debated so fully, stand. But, in order to express my idea in the fewest possible terms, I ask the Secretary to read the proposed section which was intended to be offered to the bill. I do not offer it, but simply ask that it be read as part of my remarks.

VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. — That to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to maintain the parity of all forms of money coined or issued by the United States, and to strengthen and maintain the reservein the Treasury authorized and required by the act entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payment," the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to issue from time to time as required for such purposes in a sum not exceeding in the aggregate 200,000,000, coupon or registered bonds of the United States in such form as he may prescribe and of denominations of $50, or some multiple of that sum, redeemable in coin of the present standard value at the pleasure of the United States after three years from the date of their issue and bearing interest payable semiannually in such coin at the rate of 3 per cent per annum. The said bonds and the interest thereon shall be exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties of the United States, as well as from taxation of any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority, and the said bonds shall have set forth and expressed upon their face the above specified conditions, and shall with their coupons be made payable at the Treasury of the United States. The proceeds of such bonds shall be used for the purposes defined in this section and none other.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now, Mr. President, the passage of some such provision is undoubtedly necessary, and I trust that the Senators on the other side of the Chamber who have the control necessarily, who have the majority, will make some such provision as this. I feel at liberty to call their attention to the subject, because I consider it vital. I fear very much that after a little while, as to the results of the measure that we are about to accomplish, the suspension of the purchasing clause of the act of 1890, the people will find out that it has not been the germ and root of the evil under which they are suffering, and they will look to us for having provided an inefficient measure, a measure that will not meet the exigency.

On the other hand, if the Secretary of the Treasury was armed with this power he probably would not find it necessary to use it for more than $50,000,000. This proposition is to authorize him to issue $200,000,000 3 per cent Treasury notes or bonds, coupon or otherwise, bearing 3 per cent interest, and that they shall be sold, not through the agency of bankers or syndicates or anybody else, or the money power which is so much feared by some of our friends here, the Populists, but that he shall let them be sold through the post-offices and through the subtreasuries wherever the Government has any money or any power to pay money. I will venture the prophecy, as I did awhile ago, that these bonds would be eagerly taken by the laboring men of our country, by business men, by those who are seeking to gather a nest for a house or a home. I have no doubt whatever that would be the direct effect, and it would have an enormous effect upon the public credit.

The fact that the Government of the United States, with its unquestioned credit and unquestioned power, came with $290,-000,000 of bonds in their hands, offering them for coin to maintain the parity of all these kinds of money, would settle the question of parity and resumption. Under the resumption act we have been called upon for the payment of only $38,000,000 in the fifteen years that have transpired since that act took effect. We have not been called upon for more than one-third of the actual coin held as security, and yet the coin thus deposited performed its full function by giving confidence. If you would give the Secretary of the Treasury the same power the Secretary had fifteen years ago in regard to resumption, there would be no fear that all forms of money would be maintained at a parity with each other. These are questions which should be considered immediately after the passage of the pending bill.

With these remarks, Mr. President, feeling a real sympathy, as I said in the beginning here, for our fellow-citizens in the mining States, and while they may suffer for a time considerable loss and injury, I believe it is for the good of our whole country and the best interest of our people of all classes and conditions of life to stand upon the double standard of gold and silver, one the real standard, and silver to be used as fully as possible without demonetizing gold.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, I have not detained the Senate many moments in the discussion of the pending question. have studiously refrained from doing so. But I can not help observing the very remarkable attitude of the distinguished Senatorfrom Ohio, who is the acknowledged leader on the other side of this Chamber, and of more than half the Senators who support the bill for the repeal of the purchasing clause of the so-called Sherman law. His anxiety for its repeal, his support of its repeal, is perfectly well understood; but at the same time that distinguished Senator has well known the fact that the passage of the pending bill was impossible at any time except as a nonpartisan measure, except by the support of the twenty-five or twenty-six Republicans on the other side of the Chamber and the twenty-one or twenty-two Democrats on this.

Its only hope of success from the beginning until now has been unity of action between gentlemen who have such diverse views upon general political questions, and not to bring in the mere party question and attempt to take party advantage of the de-lays, of the mistakes, if there have been mistakes; and now, in the closing hours of the struggle, which will go down in history as one of the most remarkable that has ever taken place in this Chamber, that distinguished leader tells us and tells the country that the measure itself will be impotent, that it eliminates will be silver or the further use of it for the present.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not say a word to that effect. On the contrary, I spoke strongly in favor of silver to its largest extent, so that it would not demonetize gold.

Mr. GORMAN. If I have misunderstood the Senator, all around me here seem to have shared with me in misunderstanding him. He has said that the passage of the bill as it stands will not give the relief to the country that the country has expected.

Mr. SHERMAN. I said it might not meet the expectations of the people.

Mr. GORMAN. If his argument was understood at all on this side of the Chamber, he said that when the bill is passed the Treasury will not be in a condition to meet the wants of the country, or to keep the finances in a healthy condition; and the only relief suggested by the Senator is to issue bonds, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to use them not only for the purpose of maintaining the parity between the two metals, but for the ordinary expenditures of the Government.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a

Mr. GORMAN. With great pleasure.
Mr. SHERMAN. How does he propose to pay the deficiency in the revenues of $50,000,000, reported by the Secretary of the Treasury

Mr. GORMAN. I will come to that, if the Senator will pardon me a moment.

Now, Mr. President, if I understood the position of the Dem-we pledged ourselves to the repeal of the Sherman law.

Mr. BUTLER. A part of it?

Mr. GORMAN. No, sir; the whole law. Our platform demanded it. Every newspaper that has breathed a Democratic at first demanded that Congress should carry out the decree of the party. I take it that other Senators like myself were questioned by the great metropolitan press as to whether we were in favor of the absolute repeal of that law, the whole law, without conditions. When that was being strongly urged I do not think I am mistaken when I say that the distinguished Senator from Ohio in a speech or an interview in his own State denounced the repeal of the entire Shermanlaw, and stated that he would favor the repeal of the purchasing clause alone. I am not mistaken in that. If I am, I ask the Senator to correct me. The Senator says that now?

Mr. SHERMAN. I believe that is what the bill professes

Mr. GORMAN. Yes; that is what the bill professes. I am coming to that. The President of the United States, anxious and earnestin his desire for its repeal, was too astute and learned a statesman not to know that he had not the power in his own party or with his own party to repeal any portion of that law, because the division is so sharp and great among both parties that neither party would have the power to deal with this question and make the repeal, and we were compelled to take the terms offered by the Senator from Ohio. He held the key of the position. You have dictated the terms to us. It was the only thing we could get you to agree to for the relief the country.

Then, Mr. President, when Congress met, we came here with forty-four Senators on this side of the Chamber, elected as Democrats, only one-half of this body, with the perfect knowledge on the part of every intelligent man in the Union that the party was hopelessly divided upon this question, as your party is also hopelessly divided. It may be said with truth that a large ma-jority of the Democrats were at the beginning of the session against the repeal even of the purchasing clause of the Sherman

Mr. BUTLER. Unconditionally.

Mr. GORMAN. The unconditional repeal. It was known that you had from thirteen to fifteen Republicans opposed to repeal. It was believed, and I think it was a fact easily made perfectly plain to everybody, that a clear majority of all the Senators elected were not in favor of the unconditional repeal, but they wanted some rediffection.

but they wanted some modification.

Complaints have been made of delay in this matter. I am glad of the opportunity to say, and I say it in justice to those who have fought this bill, that those of us who intended to vote for its final pussage believed that we were in the minority, and a de-lay of weeks became necessary that we might convert enough to our side to pass the bill. It was not brought into this body from the Committee on Finance until days after we had met. The Senator frem Ohio, a great member of that committee and an authority in this body on financial questions, and with a reputation such as few men have ever had in the country, was too astute a man to try to force its early consideration in this body. When his Committee, and even the Senator from Ohio, checked their impetuosity, and said, "Oh, no; let the Committee on Finance first consider the bill."

The fact of it was that we were not ready for its consideration. As time went on the dob to became sharp. And, Mr. President, I want to remark right here that it has been a great debate. The annals of Congress will not show one equal to it, and those who participated in it will go down to posterity as men who were equal to any who have preceded them. When the contest be-came sharp the doubt was then expressed as to the power of the Senate to pase it, not as to the power to reach a vote, but the power to pass unconditional repeal with a majority. In the very midst of the fight, in the hottest of it, when men were anxious, when every Senator was desirous that something might be done (and when I say every Senator I mean all on both sides of the Chamber) to relieve the great distress in the financial interests and in commercial affairs, the first note of warning that we had, publicly uttered, came from the Senator from Ohio, the Senator who led more than one-half of the repeal column, that it was impossible to pass it. Here is his interview, published October 5, 1893, in a telegram to the Cincinnati Enquirer dated Wash ington, October 4:

[Cincinnati Enquirer, October 5, 1893.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 4.

I called on Senator Sherman to-night. More than any other quantity in the Senate he represents his party. I asked him bluntly if he believed the law which bore his name would be repealed?

His answer was frank—direct:

"I do not," said he.

"Then," said I, "what next?"

"I can not," said he, "be explicit as to what next. The position of the Republican members of the Senate is now passive. The Democrats are endeavoring to arrange a compromise. If they succeed, they can pass a compromise measure no matter if the Republican Senators are solidly arrayed against it. Our side, or rather the large majority of our side, stand ready to vote for unconditional repeal whenever the Democrats fix the time in vote. We are even ready to support a closure."

"Have you any idea," I asked, "of the terms of compromise?"

"No," said the Senator, "I am not in the secrets of those arranging it. There have been several propositions involving the issue of bonds and the reduction of the monthly purchases of silver. My judgment is, and it is, however, a judgment, that in the end the Democrats will unite on a proposition to extend the provisions of the Sherman law three years, with a reduction of the monthly purchases of silver to 2,500,000 ounces of silver instead of 4,500,000 ounces as now."

"Do you think the President would sign such a bill?"

"I have no reason of knowing. Yet I am impressed he will yield to a fair compromise. If he does not he will destroy his party, and his Administration will be broken down.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the reporter has been rather more

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the reporter has been rather more accurate than usual in that interview. I think that was the substance of what I said. I desire merely to add that I believe the bill would not have passed but for the abortive attempt to compromise, which, falling through, left nothing else to do but to pass it. However that is a mere matter of interview between ourselves

Mr. GORMAN. October 4 is the date of this interview. The Senator from Ohio knew perfectly well, as every other man in the country knew, that he was laying down a condition for the Democratic party to unite. He knew to unite was as impossible as it was to fly, unless it meant the extension of the purchase of silver to some future period. He knew that the demand in the country for its unconditional repeal coming to us through the press and trade organizations in every section was such that the entire Senate was most anxious to do something to relieve anxiety. He knew another thing, that with the difference of views upon this financial question between the East and the West and the North and the South it was impossible to pass what we call in the Eastern States a sound financial bill with bonds unless we had his cooperation and the cooperation of those on the other side who thought with us: and when you placed the conditions upon the Democratic party, as you had the power to do, holding the key of the situation with your 25 or 26 votes, you forced us into a position to take a measure that would not be satisfactory to the people for whom the Senator from Ohio speaks and whom I have the honor to represent in part on this floor.

But, Mr. President, there was an earnest desire, there has been from the beginning of the session an earnest desire on this side of the Chamber, to frame such legislation as might redound to the interest of all the people of this country. Sharp as the division was upon the particular measures, there is not a Democrat upon this side of the Chamber who was not impressed with the deviation of the country. desire to harmonize the party, to sustain the Democratic Administration. All were willing to make sacrifices of opinion and to set aside the convictions of a lifetime and unite in doing and to set aside the convictions of a lifetime and unite in doing something which would relieve the business distress and save their Administration from defeat. They tried to get together. They tried to do what was right. There were many of them who shared the conviction that it is extraordinary, unusual, and unfortunate to strike down summarily, without an hour's warning, any great interest that we had built up or made possible by laws. no matter how vicious and bad the laws themselves. Their deliberations could have been carried to a consummation with the bonds that the Senator from Ohio speaks of.

I do not complain of him for making the suggestion of bonds except as to the time and manner of doing it, for I from the beginning, not of this Congress, but in the last, under Mr. Harrison's Administration, believed that with the extravagant appropriations that have been made, with the growth of expenditures for pensions, and otherwise, which can not be eliminated, there is not revenue enough to pay the current expenses of the Government under your present laws, and at the last session of Congress I voted with the Senator from Ohio to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds for all these purposes.

If, Mr. President, there had been less partisanship in this Chamber when we came to consider a proposition that would have practically united this side, if we had had a response from the id.

Senator from Ohio and those who associate with him politically, we could have passed a bill repealing the purchasing clause of the Sherman law, no matter whether it takes effect to-morrow or the next day, and we would have strengthened the Treasury, given the Secretary power to issue $200,000,000 of gold, and it would have been a notice to the world that this country, in that matter as in all others, had the power and the will to maintain our honor and keep our finances to the very highest possible level.

I am not here, Mr. President, to violate the confidences that have been given to me in all the suggestions that have been made by members of this body, or gentlemen outside of the body. I can say, though, with propriety that there is scarcely one of us who in the very heat of this controversy has not been most willing to make the suggestions and look to a better bill than the one we now have. That is past. The responsibility—

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to say a word, if I do not interrupt the Senator.

Mr. GORMAN. Not at all.
Mr. SHERMAN. I am quite sure if our Democratic friends on the other side of the Chamber had made any proposition, such as the Senator now mentions, providing for the coinage of what is called the seigniorage, and providing for the maintenance of all forms of money at par with each other by authorizing the sale of $200,000,000 of bonds, the proposition would probably have been very agreeable to this side of the Chamber; but, as I understand—as a matter of course I do not ask for any secretsour friends on the other side of the Chamber declined to agree to any proposition which contained authority to issue bonds. I think that was the general understanding on this side.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, as I said, I would not, to relieve myself from being misunderstood or for any other purpose in the world, violate confidences or repeat conversations which have been had; but I have a right to say that we have been most unfortunate if we were not understood to say that a provision for a proper bond issue could have been passed without much

I agree now with the Senator from Ohio. The day, the hour for all that has passed. I should not have referred to this matter but for the fact that the Senator in his remarks, which will be found in the RECORD of the 18th of October, on page 2758, at-tempted to place the entire responsibility on the Democrats.

The President suggests, however, that the first and most important measure, before further action, is to clear away the present sliver-purchasing clause of the act of 1890. We have thought so too, but if the other side do not think so it cannot be done, for sheir vote is potent. They carry the matter in their own hands. Let them agree upon something.

In times past, when they were in the minority and we were in the majority, we never shrank from responsibility. We were Republicans because we believ d in Republican principles and Republican men and Republican measures, and whenever a question came into the Senate Chamber to be decided we never pleaded the baby act and said "we could not agree." We met to gether in conclave; we measured each other's opinions, some giving way, and finally we came to an agreement. In this way we passed all the great laws which have marked the history of the last thirty years of our country, and it was not done by begging votes of the other side. We knew that, by the usual and almost universal habit of the Democratic party, they would oppose anything we should propose, even the Lord's Commandments or the Lord's Prayer. [Laughter.]

Sir, these are public duties that can not be avoided. You must decide this silver question some way or other. If you can not do it and will retire from the Senate Chamber we will settle it on this side, and we will do the best we can with our silver friends who belong to us, who are blood of our blood and bone of our bone. But you have the majority on this floor to-day, and therefore I beg of you, not in reproach, not in anger, because I know the great difficulty and the difference of opinion that exists in the two parties; you have the supreme honor of settling this question now, and you ought to do it. That is all I care to say on that point.

And again to-day, wittingly or unwittingly, he endeavored to place upon this side of the Chamber the responsibility of any future failure, or the failure of this act, to give relief. Mr. President, the responsibility does not belong to one party. If the act does not meet public expectation, we must on both sides share the responsibility; but it may turn out to be the wisest thing that this bill shall pass just as it came from the committee. If so, we will share the credit.

Mr. President, that there is to be further trouble with our financial affairs everybody who has watched the operations of the Treasury must know. We have come into power, but we have inherited an enormous debt, imperfect revenue laws, and stagnation in every industry. The Treasury is bankrupt, says the Senator from Ohio. It was bankrupt when we accepted it and when we came into power. Who is responsible for it?

We are $50,000,000 short, says the Senator from Ohio. Why, Mr. President, I hold a statement in my hand showing that dur-

the obligations of the Government created by law have not been discharged; but after paying the amounts which were absolutely necessary to keep the Government running, including the payment of pensions, there is a shortage of $50,000,000, soon to be increased to $80,000,000, which must be met. The Government of the United States can not repudiate its debts. It is not the fault on this side of the Chamber as a party. Conceal the facts as you may, you can not make party capital out of it, for the honest men of the country will know what the facts are.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask my friend, if he will allow me, whether the last House of Representatives was not strongly Democratic, and whether all the appropriations for the support of the Government did not originate there? I myself supposed that both parties shared in the responsibility for excessive ap-

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, it is true that the last House of Representatives was Democratic; it is true that the Republican party have had possession of the executive branch and of this branch of the Government; and it is true that we could not cut down these expenditures unless we had control of all branches of the Government. Now, that we have that control, we hope or the Government. Now, that we have that control, we hope to cut down expenditures as rapidly as possible.

But we have inherited another thing—contracts which have been made by law, and from which there is no escape. Obligations have been incurred on all sides. They must be met.

All I complain of now is that Senators on the other side of this Chamber at the end of a great crisis in this body, and, I hope, almost at the end of a great financial panic, should bring up this question for the purpose of gaining party advantage.

Mr. President, we shall take the responsibility of all the new laws which will be enacted during the time we are in power. We shall go as far as it is possible for men to go in relieving the country of the bad laws now upon the statute books; we shall insist upon the consideration of legislation for that purpose in season and out of season if necessary, but we do object to being held up to the country as responsible for laws which were not of our enacting.

I trust the Senator from Ohio and Senators on the other side of the Chamber, who unite with the President upon this one measure, will yet withdraw their partisan efforts, and admit that this is a question above party, and which could not be passed if it were a party question. We must all share the full responsibility of whatever may come from this enactment.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, when the author of the demonetization of silver sees fit to place the representatives of the mining States in the position of beggars, of suppliants asking for pity, I feel called upon to repel the insult. The confiscation of our property by the machinations of that Senator ought to induce him to refrain from placing us in that humiliating posi-

We laid the foundation of an empire by the discovery and development of mines. The daring and enterprise involved in accomplishing that great result has no parallel in the industrial comprising that great result has no parametric in the industrial energies of the American people.

When the mines had been developed and the foundation laid for the prosperity of this country by an ample supply of gold and silver, and when silver was 3 per cent premium, the Senator from Ohio, through English influence, managed to destroy silver for the benefit of English creditors. I speak from the record when I say that it was through English influence, and I call the Sensior from Ohio himself as my witness. On the 6th of March, 1876, in this Chamber, the Senator from Ohio used the following language:

Our coimage act came into operation on the 1st of April, 1873, and constituted the gold one-dollar piece the sole unit of value, while it restricted the legal tender of the new siver trade dollar and the half dollar and subdivisions to an amount not exceeding $5 in one payment. Thus the double standard previously existing was finally abolished, and the United States as usual was influenced by Great Britain in making gold coin the only standard. This suits England, but does not suit us.

I took occasion on the 5th of September last to follow the slimy tracks of the act of 1873 through the records of the two Houses of Congress, and I pointed out why it was that Thurman, Conk-ling, Blaine, Kelley, and a very large number of others, who were paying particular attention to legislation, did not know when the act passed, and the President of the United States was also ignorant of the fact when he signed the bill that it demon-etized silver. When the Senator from California [Mr. Perkins] said that it had been passed with entire honesty, I think he had not read the history of that unfortunate legislation.

I wish to say, further, that the Senators representing the silver States have not placed their opposition to this proposed legislation on the score that it destroys the principal industry ing the last three years there have been appropriated for various purposes, including $49,000,000 per annum for the sinking fund, $362,000,000 more than the revenues. The money has, of course, not all been spent, because we did not have it in the Treasury; fact that those States must remain comparatively a desert land for generations to come in consequence of this destruction of their industry, the fact that the great continental railroads and all the railroads leading there are threatened with bankruptcy by a destruction of their business, is small in comparison with the effect that the legislation I refer to, procured through English influence, is having upon the whole country.

When the Senator from Ohio says that we must be sacrificed for the general good of the whole country, we say if this proposed legislation was for the general good we should not be heard here; but it has been demonstrated to the satisfaction of all who have listened that this is a question affecting humanity; that it has already prostrated the industries of this country, and that the wheat-growers and the cotton-planters have suffered equally with us. While the Senator was enjoying himself in the cloak room, for he said he had avoided the discussion in that way so as not to be inconvenienced, it has been demonstrated over and over again, and now we hear him pleading for the public good.

as not to be inconvenienced, it has been demonstrated over and over again, and now we hear him pleading for the public good. For what public good is he pleading? He is pleading for the public good which he says produced this result—English influence; he is pleading for that public good which Gladstone said consisted in obligations against foreign countries and in favor of England, amounting to ten thousand million dollars of bonds. That public good is to increase the purchasing power of those bonds, as Mr. Gladstone contended, and no other public good has ever been pointed out to be accomplished by the destruction of one-half of the world's money. That is the only public good. The greed of English foreign bondholders and American bondholders is the only good which has been pointed out in all this debate, that is to be secured and is to be augmented by the utter destruction of the mining interests and to the utter prostration of the agricultural States, and we find that Senator here pleading for more bonds, more interest, to augment the colossal power of the bondholding fraternity.

The Senator truly says that our Treasury is in a bankrupt condition. Of course it is. Who placed it in that condition? That same relentless hand which struck down silver has pulled from under the fabric of credit in the Treasury Department the foundation which our fathers reared—coin. With $600,000,000 of silver coin in the country, we are told that we must abandon it and borrow gold, and augment the wealth of the bondholding

I shall not repeat the arguments which have been piled up here to show that the shrinking volume of gold means misery to the human race, if that is to be the only basis of our circulation and credit. That gold is already hoarded or pooled by the few, and the attempt to purchase it will simply load us with more debt.

What else was done through English influence and strategy in this Chamber? We were denied the right guaranteed by the Constitution to mine and coin our own money, and have a big surplus for the creditor class. Well might Senators leave the Senate Chamber when I commenced these remarks. Many of them are interested parties. As rumor has it bank stocks and bonds are not strangers here. More bonds, more bank stock, more taxation, more contraction, more falling prices, and more hard times is the motto of those who are forcing this legislation through Congress.

I do not intend to protract my remarks at this time, because there is an amendment pending to which I desire to call attention, and for which I should like to vote.

Mr. ALLEN. I suggest the lack of a quorum. I find by actual count there are only fourteen Senators present in the Chamber at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LINDSAY in the chair). The lack of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich, Lindsay. Allen, Bate, Dolph, Faulkner, Lodge, McMillan, McPherson, Martin, Quay, Ransom, Fauther, Frye, Gallinger, George, Gorman, Harris, Higgins, Hill, Hoar, Irby. Berry, Blackburn, Sherman, Shoup, Smith, Martin, Mills, Mitchell, Wis. Morrill, Murphy, Palmer, Blackbur Brice, Butler, Call, Camden, Carey, Colte, Stewart, Stockbridge, Vest, Vilas, Pasco, Peffer, Perkins, Cullom, Davis, Irby, Jones, Nev. Walthall, Washburn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-two Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. STEWART. I now call attention to the amendment under consideration. I agree with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] that the free-coinage Senators will all vote for this amendment, not as a substantial proposition, not as being what we ought to have, but because it recognizes silver to a limited extent, and recognizes the principle which has been so much talked about, of coining the American product with a seigniorage of 20 per cent.

This American product idea has been interjected into the mining States very extensively by politicians from the East, When they go to the mining States the gold men usually say, "Are you not satisfied with having something done for the American product? Why do you want to benefit foreigners?" We have told them that there was no good faith in that; that the representatives in the East would not vote for the coinage of the American product if it was proposed; but the Senator from California [Mr. Perkins] has brought forward a proposition, and I am very glad of it, for I want to test the sincerity of the advocates of the American product policy; but the amendment is in such a condition that I can not vote for it as it stands. I presume the Senator would like to have it put in such shape as would express fully the idea.

Section 1 of the amendment reads as follows:

That the mints of the United States shall be open to the coinage of sliver of proved American production at the same parity now existing between gold and sliver, with a minting or seigniorage charge of 20 per cent, which shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

I do not know what "the same parity" means. I suppose the Senator meant the ratio of 16 to 1, or the present legal ratio. To use the words "the same parity" would undoubtedly defeat the law by some construction of the Treasury Department. They can do almost anything with that word "parity," and consequently the amendment should be amended so as to be in conformity with our coinage laws, and should say what it undoubtedly means.

The second section of the amendment reads:

That hereafter no gold pieces for circulation of a less denomination than $10 be coined, and no more legal tender, national currency, or Treasury notes of a less denomination than $5 be issued.

I think that is bringing in another question which requires considerable consideration. I do not think I am prepared to vote for such a proposition without being better advised as to what its operation would be.

The next section of the amendment reads:

That the holder of any standard silver dollars which have been or may hereafter be coined may deposit the same with the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States in any sum, and receive therefor notes of denominations less than $10 only, which notes shall have the same legatender quality as the coin for which they are exchanged. The coin deposited for or representing the said notes shall be retained in the Treasury for the payment of the same on demand.

I do not know that silver certificates ought to be confined to $10. I think probably that $5 or less would be better. I do not think the limitation of the amendment would be well.

The next section of the amendment reads:

SEC. —. That in order to protect the mints against imposition no eliver shall be coined under this act except such as is produced by smelters situated in the United States.

I suppose, of course, that would exclude all ores reduced by any other process than by smelting. I suppose the Senator is aware of the fact that in the United States ores are reduced by other processes than the smelting process. The process of amalgamation has been carried to a very great state of perfection. The whole Comstock mining was reduced by means of amalgamation. There is another process called lixiviation, which has been practiced in the United States; and then there is another process which consists in smelting. This section of the amendment confines the operation to the silver produced from smelting. I do not know that the Senator intended that. I think I can relieve the situation by an amendment I have drawn up, which I think embodies the principle which the Senator desires to accomplish. I shall read that amendment and explain how it might be included in carrying out the idea of coining the American product.

I find that there is a great difficulty in this country in obtaining enough subsidiary coin. The Secretary of the Treasury has the power to purchase silver, and coin it into subsidiary coin. That power was given under the act of 1853, and it has not been taken away; but the power has not been well exercised. It very frequently happens that it is almost impossible to make change, and there is not enough in the market here. You will find about half the business in dealing there is running about getting change in order to do the ordinary marketing in this town and everywhere else. So I have thought it best to restore the old law of 1837, and the same principle which existed previous to 1837, that silver for all coinage purposes should be obtained in the same way and brought to the mints by depositors, and the subsidiary coin should be full legal tender. They could have as much then coined at the mints as they desired to have. So I have embodied in the first section the same principle, and, in fact, the same language as that contained in the act of 1837.

SEC. 2. That the silver coins of the United States shall be composed of standard silver. That of the silver coins the dollar shall be of the weight of 412½ grains; the half dollar of the weight of 200½ grains; the quarter dollar of the weight of 103½ grains; and the dime, or tenth part of a dollar, of the weight of 41½ grains. And that dollars, half dollars, quarter dollars, and dimes shall be legal tenders of payment, according to their nominal value, for any sum

That is the law of 1837.

That is the law of 1837.

SEC. 3. That silver bullion brought to any mint of the United States for coinageshall be received and coined by the proper officers for the benefit of the depositor: Provided, That it shall be lawful to refuse, at the mint, any deposit of less value than $100, and any bullion so base as to be unsuitable for the operations of the mint: And provided further. That it shall be lawful to refuse at the mint any deposit of silver coin or bullion which is not the product of the mines and smelters of the United States.

SEC. 4. That the depositor of silver bullion at any mint of the United States for coinage, as hereinbefore provided, shall receive therefor 80 per cent of the coinage value thereof, either in silver coin or in Treasury notes of the United States hereinafter described, and the remaining 20 per cent of such bullion shall be coined and covered into the Treasury; such Treasury motes shall be prapared and issued by the Secretary of the Treasury in such form and in such denominations not less than $1 nor more than $1,000, as he may prescribe; and such Treasury notes shall be redeemable on demand at the Treasury of the United States, or at the office of any assistant treasurer of the United States, in silver coin, and such Treasury notes shall be a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private.

The seigniorage here is the same as that suggested by the

The seigniorage here is the same as that suggested by the Senator from California, and the language used, I think, carries out the conception which he had in presenting the amendment. This is the seigniorage of 20 per cent. A seigniorage of 27 per cent would place the value of silver bullion precisely on a par with the value of rupees as established by the Indian Govern-ment in the recent order suspending the coinage of silver. Twenty-seven per cent seigniorage would value the bullion precisely as Great Britain valued the silver in the rupee.

I shall ask a vote on this amendment with 20 per cent. then ask a vote on my amendment proposing 27 per cent. Twenty-seven per cent would reduce the value of the silver in the silver dollar to 73 cents, and it would be, as I before remarked, precisely on a par with the valuation placed upon silver by the Indian commission, which recommended and secured the order of the Indian Government suspending the coinage of silver.

I offer this amendment as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from California, and ask a vote upon it in that shape. Mr. VOORHEES. Does the Senator offer his amendment to take the place of the amendment of the Senator from California, or as an addition to that amendment:

Mr. STEWART. I offer it as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from California. Perhaps, however, he will accept it as a substitute.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I think my proposition is a very simple one and very easily understood. Perhaps the amendment might be modified in section 4, after the word "smelters," by inserting "or by refineries or mills," if the word "smelters is not definite enough.

Mr. STEWART. "Refineries or mills" would not cover it.

A good deal is produced which is not reduced in the mills.

Mr. PERKINS. If the words I have proposed do not suit the purpose, then I shall modify the amendment by inserting after the word "smelters" the words "or other saving devices."

I will say to my friend from Nevada that we are doing pretty I will say to my friend from Nevada that we are under I am well if we get the Senate to adopt the amendment I offer. I am well if we get the Senate to adopt the amendment I offer. I presatisfied with small favors and large ones in proportion. I prefer my amendment should stand as it is, with the modification I have suggested. If the Senator sees proper to offer his amendment as an amendment to mine, of course, he has that right.

Mr. STEWART. What does the Senator mean by coinage at "the same parity?"

Mr. PERKINS. It is a misprint. The word "parity" should be "ratio." It is so written in the original amendment upon the

Mr. STEWART. I offer my amendment, then, as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from California, and upon it Mr. STEWART.

Is shall ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the amendment be reported.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada will be reported.

The SECRETARY. After section 1 it is proposed to insert:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. Strewart to the bill (H. R. 1) to repeal the act of July 14, 1890, entitled, "An act directing the purchase of sliver bullion and the issue of Treasury notes thereon, and for other purposes," vis: After section I insert the following:

SEC. 2. That the sliver coins of the United States shall be composed of standard sliver. That of the sliver coins the dollar shall be of the weight of 412 grains; the half dollar of the weight of 2005 grains; the half dollar of the weight of 103½ grains; and the dime, or tenth part of a dollar, of the weight of 41½ grains. And that dollars, half dollars, quarter dollars and dimes shall be legal tenders of payment, according to their nominal value, for any sum whatever.

SEC. 3. That sliver bullion brought to any mint of the United States for coinage shall be received and coined by the proper officers for the benefit of the depositor: Provided, That it shall be lawful to refuse, at the mint, any deposit of less value than $100, and any bullion so base as to be unsuitable for the operations of the mint: And provided further. That it shall be lawful to refuse, at the mint, any deposit of silver coin or bullion which is not the product of the mines and smelters of the United States.

SEC. 4. That the depositor of silver bullion at any mint of the United States for coinage, as hereinbefore provided, shall receive therefor 80 per cent of the coinage value thereof either in silver coin or in Treasury notes of the United States hereinafter described, and the remaining 20 per cent of such bullion shall be coined and covered into the Treasury; such Treasury notes shall be prepared and issued by the Secretary of the Treasury in such form and in such denominations, not less than $1 nor more than $1,000, as he may prescribe; and such Treasury notes shall be redeemable on demand at the Treasury of the United States or at the office of any assistant treasurer of the United States in silver coin; and such Treasury notes shall be a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private.

Mr. SHOUP. Mr. President, the question involved in the bill upon which we are expected to cast our votes is, in my opinion, the most important national question presented to Congress since the organization of the Government. It is a question as momen-tous to the West and to the people of the whole country as was the great question before Congress in 1861. Then the freedom of a race was at stake. Now it is the financial liberty of all classes that hangs in the balance. Then the unity of States was in danger. Now the classes seek to dominate and enslave the masses of all the States. Over the first contest the nation was so violently shaken that the great structure came near to utter ruin.

There will be no appeal to arms in this contest, but the people are and will be deeply stirred, and the ballot will repudiate and correct the action this day taken before the final act can be consummated.

When the Union was in great peril the people of the West offered their services and took an active part in the conflict. Now, can it be possible, in defending what to us seems to be a question of such overshadowing national importance, and which means ruin and desolation to so many firesides and to so many of the people we represent, that we can be expected to willingly consent to unconditional repeal.

No, Mr. President, we will not, and we enter our earnest pro-test against forcing upon us such unpatriotic and vicious legis-

This is a question affecting the masses of the people of this great nation; and yet one which you absolutely refuse to submit to the people.

We know what their verdict would be, and we suspect that you know equally well that there would be an overwhelming majority for silver as money. It is one of the main supports of the superstructure of this Government.

Mr. President, since the memorable day when our liberty-loving ancestors declared their independence, no people in any land have been more proud of their ancestry and of their achievements than have the people of the United States. Mr. President, I am compelled with deep regret, but in all sincerity, to declare that in my judgment the independence which we have enjoyed, and which was purchased at such great sacrifice by those we revere, is this day placed in jeopardy.

Mr. President, the bill reported by a majority of the Finance Committee, and which it is proposed to force upon the people, is in violation of the spirit and promise of the Constitution of our Government. It is in violation of the principles of our Government because we submit to the dictation of capitalists of a foreign nation, voiced, I must admit, for selfish interests, by allies in our own country, who, as I stated in my remarks not many days ago, are resorting to the most extraordinary methods to coerce Congress into enacting a law which will place this Government gress into enacting a law which will place this Government financially at the mercy of the strongest and most exacting monetary people on the globe. There are some of us, however, who, if we could prevent it by lawful means, would never submit to this humiliation. If we did, we would not only degrade ourselves in our own estimation, and in the estimation of our people, but are the believe in the setting time to the stimution of the setting time. as we believe, in the estimation of the people of all civilized na-

Mr. President, if Senators would consent to the passage of the pending amendment, with or without seigniorage, we would, in my opinion, become the greatest of all monetary nations. We are contending for one of the greatest principles of a free people. you believe that our mints should not be open to the coinage

If you believe that our mints should not be open to the coinage of silver from other nations, why not open them to the production of the mines of our own country? I for one believe in the unlimited coinage of both gold and silver. I have no fear of possessing too much metallic money.

While I shall vote for the pending amendment, which restricts the coinage to the product of our own mines, believing, as I do, that no more favorable legislation can be obtained for silver, I can not, since you confine the coinage to the production of our own country, understand why you exact a tribute of one-fifth of that production. Why not exact the same tribute from the owner of gold bullion? Are you afraid that the energy, courage, and skill of the silver prospector and miner will be rewarded beyond his merits? This proposed seigniorage is nothing more nor less his merits? This proposed seigniorage is nothing more nor less than a tax levied upon the enterprise of the boldest, and for the welfare of all, most desirable, even needful character. Satisfy your consciences on that point and you will satisfy me. But confined to our own product, I certainly think that every principle of justice demands equality for these metals.

The purchase or coinage of a small amount of silver monthly, as suggested in some of the proposed amendments, would save only to degrade the metal still lower; would give it less standing than it now enjoys. In order to give silver a fair test the entire product should be absorbed. Give it a trial, and if our predictions that it will bring prosperity to the nation are not realized, you will then have just cause, and not until then, to legislate against it. It is not just to compromise our principles away, and then hold our cause responsible for disastrous results.

If France, with a population of but little more than half the population of this country, can hold with perfect ease $700,000,000 in silver the United States can without embarrassment maintain a much greater amount. It is the small transactions that require a large volume of money; large transactions are usually settled by checks or bills of exchange. Silver is therefore the money of the people.

Every laboring man and woman, every business and professional man, every contractor, manufacturer, or others employ-ing men, the head of every family, and every shopman and vender need silver. And if all bills under the denomination of $5 is withdrawn from circulation as provided in this amendment a very large sum of silver would at once take its place, and would at once perform a much broader function as money; and to further enlarge its usefulness provision should be made requiring banks to hold a portion of their reserve in silver.

Mr. President, I know that objection has been made to the retirement of smull bills on the ground that silver is too bulky to carry. But, Mr. President, in the section where I live we seldom see a bill of less denomination than $5, and no complaint is heard of silver being cumbersome. The greatest trouble we experience is that we can not obtain enough of it. The question of supposed convenience is a question of prejudice, if it exists at all, and one which use would most speedily overcome.

Mr. President, Wall street and Broad street continue to flood the Senate and the country with misstatements of facts. The following quotation is from a prominent Wall street institution:

NEW YORK, October 21, 1893.

Still the Senate debate drags its weary course, and still Wall street as wearily waits for its conclusion. If evidence were wanting of the serious effects of this delay, it stands out clearly in the fact that unother of our great railroad corporations has been compelled to seek protection in a receivership. The statement of the Union Pacific's finances, on the application for a receiver is mainly a rectal of the great losses of business pending the late silver depression and the protracted deferment of repeal, and it is very doubtful whether the company would have drifted into its acknowledged bankruptcy had it not been for these drains upon its business.

The Union Pacific is by no means the only one of our railroad corporations that has seriously suffered from this cause, and there is too much reason to fear that, if the silver question were allowed to remain much longer unsettled, other embarrassments may not unlikely result. The signs at Washington, however, are now looking brighter, and we may be permitted to hope that the deadly incubus of suspended legislation will soon be removed from the business and the credit of the country. The people are so positively interesting their unmistakably expressed will, that their attitude is one of impatient waiting rather than despondency; nor is it supposed that even were the repeal measure to fail of adoption in the Upper House, such defeat would amount to anything more than a transient postponement of success. * * * But while this confidence, in the ultimate suspension of silver purchases, serves as a strong support to the market, the delay of that conclusion acts in many ways as a drag upon both values and transactions. It keeps up a reservation in the larger operations of corporate credit, which tends to the embarrassment of railroad innance. It puts obstacles in the way of the resuscitation of important roads now in the process of fluncial reconstruction, and it throws a cortain cloud of suspicion around properties which otherwise would only unqualified confidenc

Mr. President, was there ever a series of statements more misleading than those contained in the article just quoted, especially as to the cause of the financial embarrassment of the Union Pacific as to the cause of the inancial embarrassment of the Union Facino and other Western railroads? If these money-changers would state the actual facts they would say to their customers and to the country that on account of the low price of silver, caused by the closing of the India mints, and on account of the arbitrary ruling of the Secretary of the Treasury, amounting in fact, as I understand the law, to a nullification of the purchasing clause of the Sharman act and with the annumentation that Congress of the Sherman act, and with the apprehension that Congress will repeal the law, many of the mines suspended operations; that orders for mining machinery were countermanded; that merchants cut down their orders for supplies more than one-half, and that as a result of it all the earnings of many of these railroads were reduced more than 50 per cent.

Had it not been for the unfriendly attitude against silver by the Government, whose duty it was to foster and protect it, and for the manufactured continent greated against it by such arti-

for the manufactured sentiment created against it by such articles as the one I have just quoted, the West would to-day be presperous, and all the railroads penetrating that region would be doing a lucrative business.

How or in what way the destruction of silver can benefit Western railroids, or any roads or lines of transportation p western rating a silver-producing country, is beyond my comprehension. With its total destruction there will be a cessation of work on all silver mines, thereby still further reducing the earnings of the transcontinental roads. If reducing their receipts 60 per cent or more will place these roads on a sound financial basis, then that result is in a fair way to be accomplished.

basis, then that result is in a fair way to be accomplished.

Had the Secretary of the Treasury purchased the full amount of silver as provided by the law of 1890, he would have relieved the West, as it would have placed in circulation in the mining States several millions of dollars, and silver would at the same time be worth much more per ounce than it is to-day. Why there should be such a relentless war upon silver can not be accounted for, unless it be for the sole purpose of yielding to the greed of the English and Eastern money-lenders and security-holders, thereby making a rich class richer at the expense of the great masses, who are toiling to develop the resources of this country, and at the same time to establish fitting homes for

The desire of those who flood us with literature proclaiming that the Sherman law must be repealed, and that there be no further production of silver, have, in my opinion, but one object in view, and that is to concentrate the money of this country and place it in the possession of a few thousand men already enormously wealthy. I do not charge that the President or the Secretary of the Treasury are in collusion with this class, but I must believe that they have given our to them to the extent that they have lost sight of the true interests of the people and the nation.

Mr. President, we claim that both the Democratic and Republican parties, through the President and their representatives in Congress, have abandoned their pledges to the people. Each party declared their intention and determination to foster The Democratic party went so far as to say and protect silver. in their platform, adopted at Chicago, that the Sherman act of 1890 "was a cowardly makeshift: " * that we hold to the 1890 "was a cowardly makeshift; that we hold to the use of both gold and silver as the standard money of the country, and to the coinage of both gold and silver, without discriminating against either metal or charge for mintage.

Mr. President, let me inquire what this declaration means? Can it be interpreted to mean anything else than this: That the Sherman act did not go far enough, and that if the Democratic party was successful at the polls they would repeal the law by substituting an act for free coinage? If they did not mean this why did they proclaim, "we hold to the use of both gold and silver as the standard money of the country, and to the coinage of both gold and silver, without discriminating against either metal or charge for mintage?"

The people of the nation believed, and yet believe, that this was an open and sincere declaration for free coinage, and you can was an open and encere declaration for free collage, and you can not convince them even now that it meant anything else.

What will Congress have accomplished provided the bill for the unconditional repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman act of 1890 becomes a law? In reply to my inquiry the historian who records our proceedings will in my opinion say:

First, that both the Republican and Democratic parties violated are of the most secred pledges contained in their platforms and one of the most sacred pledges contained in their platforms and ignored the wishes of the masses of the people. Second, that on the recommendation of the President, and in response to the urgent appeal of foreign and local capitalists, one of the grandest and most important of our resources was undermined and de-That by doing so thousands of our fellow-citizens were made bankrupt; that the savings of a lifetime of industrious and loyal citizens invested in property and in happy and confortable homes were destroyed and their owners left penniless; that we bankrupted counties, cities, and corporations; that in consequence of the destruction of the silver industry railroads were forced into the hands of receivers.

But, Mr. President, should this bill for unconditional repeal pass and become a law, the people will hereafter have their day in court. The loyalty of both Democrats and Republicans to their party, who are opposed to unconditional repeal and who are advocating free coinage as a substitute, has been questioned. Mr. President, I can answer for myself, for in my own State it is known beyond question that I am and always have been a Republican, not only in name but in principle. We believe, and are willing to go before the people on our statement, that the friends of repeal have violated their party pledges, and that we have not. If the so-called silver Senators could reach the electors of our parties I am confident that we would be sustained, but this privilege is denied us. Believing that we are right, and that we represent a large majority of the people of this country and the true interests of the nation, we will retire from this contest with a clear conscience and clean hands, and with the conviction that we have manfully and with all the energy and ability we could command, defended one of the greatest resources of our country, the honor and integrity of the nation, and the interests of those we have the honor to represent.

Mr. President, discoveries yet made in Idaho do not leave us coal and iron fields equal to those of Colorado, hence our mining population can not turn its attention to those lines of development. Gold mining will of course continue to be a prosperous industry; but with lead-silver mining eliminated, thousands of miners will be thrown out of employment.

We do not admit that our agricultural resources are second to those of any State in the Union. But as much of our agricultural land requires irrigation, hence large investments of money, their development without national aid will necessarily be slow.

Our State debt is small—small in amount, and trifling in the light of our enormous resources. Every State obligation will be light of our enormous resources. Every state obligation will be paid to the utmost cent. But there are counties in the State devoted entirely to silver-lead mining to which the passage of this bill will be a staggering blow. It will be impossible for these counties to meet their obligations until the people are restored to power and invest their great industry with new life, a life that will carry with it happiness and prosperity to every mining and agricultural hamlet in the Republic. The passage of the pending amendment would enable these people to meet their financial obligations and bring prosperity to surrounding agricultural districts.

Our farmers living adjacent to mining districts are already suffering from the lack of industrial activity in the mines. Being far inland they have relied upon the local market for the sale of their produce. The Wilson bill, without the amendment proposed by the Senator from California, will destroy this mar-

Thus all of our people feel most keenly the calamity which will be thrust upon them by the passage of the bill referred to without the amendment.

I feel that we have done all that men could do. Our people are brave, accustomed to privation and disappointment, and possess a courage that never falters. The first shock over, they will welcome the contest which the appeal to the people will bring. Being deserted by their old allies, they are ready to carry bring. Being deserted by their old allies, they are ready to carry on the contest, nothing appalled by the apparent odds; for they believe that they are part and parcel of the whole people and that the masses of all sections must share with them the disasters which these sad days will certainly bring, and that with them they will enjoy the prosperity which will follow a victory bread for the reads. by and for the people.

Mr. President, my heart aches when I think of the utter desolation and distress that will follow unconditional repeal in many localities, not only in my State, but also inother Western States and Territories.

Mr. FAULKNER. I suppose we can have a vote now on the amendment of the Senator from Nevada to the amendment.

Mr. TELLER. Let the amendment to the amendment be read.

I have not heard what it is.

The Secretary again read Mr. STEWART'S amendment.
The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] to the amendment of the Senator from California [Mr.

Mr. PEFFER. Before the vote is taken, as the Senator from Nevada is present, I should like to hear an explanation of his amendment as to how it would affect the pending amendment. I do not understand the two to be quite in harmony one with the other; and before I am ready to vote upon it I should like to have an explanation.

Mr. FAULKNER. I will state to the Senator from Kansas that the Senator from Nevada has made a full explanation of the amendment to the Senate. It is hardly fair to those of us who were here and who have staid here and listened to him to impose upon the Senator from Nevada the burden of a reëxplanation of his amendment.

What is the difficulty about my amend-Mr. STEWART. ment?

Mr. PEFFER. I wanted an explanation of the proposed amendment to the amendment so as to learn wherein it differs from the amendment offered by the Sen tor from California.

Mr. STEWART. It differs with it in the first section, where it revives the law of 1837, allowing subsidiary coin to be coined and to be a full legal tender the same as the dollar. As I explained, there is great difficulty in getting subsidiary coin under present system. If you go to any market place you will find great difficulty in finding coin enough to make change. It has not been supplied, and I think we had better return to the old method of allowing the owners of the bullion to deposit it for coining and let them have whatever kind of coin they want. they want dollars let them have dollars. If they want dimes let them have dimes. That is the first section.

Mr. PEFFER. If the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada to the amendment should be adopted, how will it from Nevada to the amendment should be adopted, now with affect the 20 per cent reserve for seigniorage?

Mr. STEWART. It is the same.

Mr. PEFFER. It would leave it the same?

Mr. STEWART. The same. In this amendment the 20 per cent for seigniorage is retained. Of course I am opposed to any seigniorage. If a provision to allow the owners of silver bullion seigniorage. to take it to the mint and have it coined on any terms or at any price can be incorporated in the bill, I shall vote for it. though I think the seigniorage is unjust, I want to eliminate from this discussion the imputation that we are seeking to sell our silver bullion. We are seeking to sustain the country by furnishing metallic money. Let the silver bullion be taxed as much as you please. Twenty per cent would reduce the price of an ounce of silver to about a dollar and three cents. As I suggested, I desire to have this proposition voted on, and I shall then try another proposition. Twenty-seven per cent would reduce the value of silver bullion to the valuation placed upon the rupee by the recentorder of the Indian commission when they demonstrated silver. Twenty per cent, of course, would make the silver in the silver dollar worth 80 cents, and 27 per cent would make it worth 73 cents. I want to get a vote on both those propositions; I desire to have it eliminated from any further interference with the currency which is contained in the proposition of the Senator from California. That amendment proposes a very radical difference in the currency. That is a matter which can be arranged afterwards; but want to put the proposition before the Senate whether our people shall be allowed to take silver bullion to the mint under any circumstances and have it coined. Although there would be such a seigniorage that probably it would close most American mines and limit the production very much, still if that should be done it would preserve the principle of coining silver for the benefit of the country.

I do not believe at all in the purchase of bullion by the Government. I never asked to have bullion purchased. It is had in principle. If silver is to be a money metal it should be coined as a money metal. I shall vote for it with these limitations upon I should like to have the yeas and nays on my amendment, which is eliminated from the retirement of smaller denominations contained in the other proposition. I do not know exactly how that would effect it. I do not like a limitation on silver. I do not like anything that looks like a limitation.

The second clause looks a little like relegating it to subsidiary coin and as if you wanted to make room for silver. Silver will make room for itself if we give it a chance. It will make room for the prosperity of this country, which does not exist and can not exist without it. To make room for silver is to make room for To drive silver out is to augment adversity, misprosperity. prosperity. To drive silver out is to augment adversity, misery, and degradation. I do not want to have anything in the bill that looks like an apology for using silver. I wish to test the sense of the Senate whether it will let silver go under any circumstances, if the miner is willing to be taxed to any degree, so that there shall be no excuse to sell silver bullion; and if the Senate will let it go on the bill, I shall be very thankful, I should like to have the yeas and mays on that proposition.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. Stew-

Mr. STEWART. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HUNTON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT]. He is detained from the Chamber by the illness of his wife. If he were here he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea."

Mr. QUAY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. Morgan], which I transfer to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. Hawley], and vote "nay."

Mr. VILAS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] who, if present, would I suppose, vote "yea" while I should vote "nay." The Senator I suppose, vote "yea" while I should vote "nay." The Senator from Missouri [Mr. Cockrell] is paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON]. I suggest to the Senator from Missouri that we transfer our pairs so that the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Oregon will stand paired and he and I can both vote. I vote "nay."
The roll call was concluded.

Mr. COCKRELL. I vote "yea."
Mr. GORMAN. I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON]. If he were present he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. PALMER. I am paired with the Senator from North

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BERRY. I offer an amendment as a proviso to the bill.
The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.
The SECRETARY. Add to the amendment of the committee already agreed to the following proviso:

Provided, That the act of February 28, 1878, entitled "An act to authorize the coinage of the standard silver dollar and to restore its legal-tender character," requiring the purchase monthly of not less than two million and not more than four million dollars' worth of silver bullion and the coining of the same as f st as purchased into standard silver dollars, be, and the same is hereby, revived and reënacted into full force and effect.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, the amendment that I have proposed, if the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. McPherson] will give me his attention for a moment, simply provides that, when the Sherman law is repealed, or the purchasing clause of it, the Bland-Allison act of 1878, which was repealed at the time of the passage of the Sherman law, shall be revived and remain in full force and effect. That is the simple effect which the amendment would have upon the bill, if it became a part of it and was then passed.

and was then passed.

In offering the amendment, Mr. President, I desire to say that it is not what I prefer. It is not what I would rather have. If I could have my will in the premises, I would have an amendment adopted to the bill which would provide for the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, and that that should become a part and parcel of the law of this land. In that I believe. But a majority of the Senate voted against this on yesterday. If there was any hope of securing that, I would not vote to revive the Bland-Allison act, because it contains provisions that I do not fully approve, but I offer this amendment in the nature of a compromise. I have offered it as a proposition that, it has seemed to me from the time this session began, all the Democrate at least could stand upon until such time as we could agree upon what should be the final policy of the party in regard to the finances of this country.

regard to the finances of this country.

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] some weeks ago in a very able and a very fair speech made here, in construing the Democratic platform which was adopted at Chicago, and about which there has been so much dispute, stated on the floor of the Senate that the Democrats are agreed that there was a declaration in that platform in favor of the repeal of the Sherman law—the Sherman law, bear in mind—not one section or clause of it, but the entire law. I agree with the Senator from Delaware that the platform did so declare.

He admitted very fairly that the platform declared further that the Democratic party committed itself to bimetallism and the coinage of both gold and silver upon such terms as would cause each to circulate upon terms of equality, and that each would have the same purchasing power. I agree with the Senator from Delaware in that proposition. He furthermore said that the platform provided that this might be done either by international agreement or by legislation; that he and those with whom he was acting believe in doing it by international agreement, and others on this side of the Chamber, including myself, believe in doing it by legislation; and that at this particular juncture and time we can not settle that question.

In all of that I agree with him; but, Mr. President, while we are waiting for the time to come when that settlement shall be had, I ask him if it is fair to other Democrats that silver shall be demonetized altogether, and that no provision shall be made for the coinage of a single dollar of it.

I assert that if this law is to be repealed, and while we are waiting to agree upon legislation, it would be fair to all Democrats that we reinstate the conditions that existed at the time this obnoxious law was passed. Let us reënact the law which this one repealed, and let it stand as a law until Democrats agree whether the two metals shall be put upon an equality by international agreement or by legislation. That, it seems to me, would be fair dealing between members of the same party, all of whom aided in the election of a Democratic President; and if you are disposed to mete out justice to us, there ought to be no objection to it on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. President, those of us who have come from Southern States, who believe in free silver, who are committed to it, who believe that our party was committed to it, have sat here from day to day and week to week, and have seen ourselves denounced by so-called Democratic papers, denounced for every conceivable crime in the calendar because we have dared to vote our honest convictions, and as our people at home behind us demand that we shall vote. We have promised them upon a hundred stumps that we would stand by free coinage. We have kept our words. All weasked was that the party should carry out its party pledges, and for that we have been denounced again and again, and while we have submitted to this we have lost no opportunity to try to urge upon this side of the Chamber some measure upon which all Democrats can unite.

When we first came here we offered to go into a Democratic caucus, either of Democratic Senators or both Democratic Senators and Democratic Members of the House. That was indignantly and contemptuously refused us. When we staid here from week to week while the fight went on, remained in our seats and answered the roll call, and then twenty-two free silver Democrats on this side of the Chamber gave a written statement upon which we pledged our honor to go into a Democratic caucus of Senators and abide by and vote for whatever a majority of the Democratic Senators would say, that was refused us. Finally, in the interest of Democratic harmony, we, together with other Democratic Senators who did not agree with us, thirty-seven of us in all, twenty-one of whom were silver Democrats, signed a proposed compromise which did not meet our views, in which we did not fully believe, in the hope that we might unite this side of the Chamber, so that we could all stand in harmony, if possible, with the Democratic Administration.

But every offer we have made has been refused; there has been no concession whatever made to us here. You seem determined that you will force this thing upon us as it is without a single letter of amendment. It may seem right to you, but I am compelled to say that it seems unfair and unjust to us. It will be a bitter lesson that goes to the people in the Southern land, men who have for twenty-five years through evil report and good report, through difficulties and dangers that no one who has not lived in that section can comprehend, stood by the Democratic party; who have supported such nominees from the East and the North as were selected for them to support, who have never faltered in their courage or in their devotion to Democratic principles. When we go back to them and we are compelled to tell them, "Your Democratic brethren from the North would make no concession, we could get nothing," it will be a bitter lesson to them.

Mr. President, I regret that it is so. I should be sorry to believe that there are any men on this side of the Chamber who take a pleasure in obtaining a victory over that class of men and over us, and especially when that victory is obtained under the leadership of the Senator from Ohio, backed by an overwhelming majority of the lifelong enemies of the Democratic party. But if you will not do it; if you are determined that we shall take it this way, and will make no concession, we can only make the record in accordance with our belief and cast our votes in favor of a proposition of compromise, of every amendment friendly to silver, and if all is refused then cast our votes against the bill.

silver, and if all is refused then cast our votes against the bill.

Mr. President, I regret that such is your determination: but if you will have it so, I hope and trust and believe that the Democrats throughout the South will do in the future as they have done in the past, rally around the Democratic banner and the Democratic flag and fight it out inside of the lines of the Democratic party until we gain all that we thought was promised us at Chicago.

at Chicago.
Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, my great respect for the Senator from Arkansas and something that I think is due to the situation impels me to say a few words at this time.

situation impels me to say a few words at this time.

There are many things which have been proposed, and will be again proposed on this floor in connection with the pending bill as amendments that under different circumstances would meet my approval. At this time I feel charged with a duty to have the bill passed if possible without any incumbrance at all. For ten weeks and more we have talked on that line. At this late hour, however much I might approve any amendment, I would not feel at liberty to support it in connection with this measure.

at liberty to support it in connection with this measure.

Senators seem to forget that there is a day beyond this. They seem to forget that there is a to-morrow, a next week, and a time besides the present to transact business and to lay down public policies. I do not expect financial legislation to expire with the present session. I do not expect the policy of the Government or of the present Administration to be circumscribed by one act. We undertook to repeal a bad law, a law that seemed to vitiate and taint the confidence in this country. Whether it did all that had been done I will not stop to inquire, but that it was charged with having done it, and that it was a pretext for breaking down public confidence is beyond question.

Whether it did all that had been done I will not stop to inquire, but that it was charged with having done it, and that it was a pretext for breaking down public confidence is beyond question.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me?

Mr. VOORHEES. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS. I wish to suggest to him that he is strong to-day because of allies over yonder; but as to those propositions which he could approve to-day but for his desire to pass this bill without amendment and without change, when he shall report or offer any one of them his allies there are gone; they are in the camp of the enemy, and he will find himself powerless then, however potent he may be to-day.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, there are some men who are sufficiently wise to-day to be able to forecast the future. The Senator from Tennessee seems to know all things, not merely for now but for all time to come. He determines what will be done over yonder next week, or next month, or in December next. So far as allies or help over there is concerned I think he would be about as weak without his allies over there as anybody I know. So I need not be reminded on that subject.

The strongest man in the whole camp—I salute him—is the Senator from Colorado [Mr. Teller]. I see that a splendid officer of the Government has been degraded because he saluted the flag of an insurgent. I salute the flag of the Senator from Colorado, who has surrendered to an inevitable force. I salute him with all the honors of war as he passes off the field. But as to the prediction of the Senator from Tennessee it passes me for naught. It was not for that that I rose; but I desire to say in the discharge of a duty which has fallen upon me as an humble instrument of the public will and the Providence that reigns over us all, I shall ask this body to cumber the pending bill with nething.

My good friend, who sits on my right, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN], for whom I would go as far as I would for any living man, has an amendment to offer. I said to him a little while ago that it pains me to vote against anything he would offer upon this floor; but we have made our battle, and I desire to pass the bill in order to wipe from the statute books of this country a pernicious law. You all admit it is a pernicious law. The men who voted for it admit it. The distinguished author even, with a manliness that does him honor and credit, here today admits that the experiment failed which he had hoped might succeed. The friends of silver made a fatal mistake in fastening it upon the statute book.

ing it upon the statute book.

All I have undertaken is to clear the deck, as I have said before, for free action hereafter. And I do not intend to be bound by votes which I shall give here against amendments in regard to the merits of those amendments. I give my votes against them because they are amendments to a bill that ought to be passed without amendment; and then an opportunity will be given for freer, fairer, and more deliberate action than we can have in connection with a measure like this.

I have been induced to say this because of the great respect and affection I bear to the Senator from Arkansas, and for the kind of men whom he represents in the South.

While I am on my feet I may venture a few words more. I had thought not to say anything till the end, but I may as well say a few words now bearing upon the present situation.

I listened to the Senator from Ohio to-day with great interest,

I listened to the Senator from Ohio to-day with great interest, as I always do, not that I approve of his views very often; but inasmuch as his views expressed to day relate somewhat to the position I have taken in regard to this matter, I may be pardoned a word. He announced here to-day that I had opposed the amendment he contemplated offering to authorize the issue of Government bonds. I did. I said, however much I might approve such a measure, though not saying that I did approve it, I would disapprove it here and now.

I said the same thing to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] in regard to his great amendment, an amendment looking to the rehabilitating and recognizing the banks in the States, taking away from great money centers their supreme control over the money questions. I believe that State banks, under proper circumstances, can be safely trusted in our monetary system. The Senator from South Carolina, with great ability, has argued that question upon this floor. He has an amendment pending here. I told him to-day (as I said from my place here on the 22d day of last August in opening this debate, when I elaborated the idea and discussed it in view of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States) that I am in favor of repealing the unconstitutional 10 per cent tax on State banks; yet that I shall have to vote against his amendment, which I heartily approve, because it is put in a connection that would be

I think it was Mr. Burke who said that statesmanship is the science of circumstances. Circumstances control men's votes and men's actions, and the circumstances of this bill warrant me, compel me to ask the friends of the measure to vote upon it straight and to vote down all amendments however just they might be as separate and independent measures. I see the press has announced that I said I regard motion to amend this bill as an unfriendly act to the bill. That is true. I said it. I say here now that an amendment offered to the bill and voted for to the bill, is an act of unfriendliness to the bill. Of course any Sen tor has the right to do it: and I have the right to speak of Senutor has the right to do it: and I have the right to speak of it in this way, with entire respect to his voting.

A word or two more, Mr. President. I have not felt myself at liberty to volunteer measures of relief for the Treasury until I am notified that the Treasury needs assistance. I have profound respect and confidence for and in the Secretary of treasury. I have profound respect in the ability, the care, the prudence, the safety of judgment of the President of the United States and the Secretary of Treasury combined. They have asked for no assistance as yet; and I do not feel warranted in asking the Finance Committee of the Senate to volunteer something that is not asked, and something that might not be ap-

In the tirst place, Mr. President, I have had no note of alarm; I have seen no signal of distress put up over the Treasury building; and even if I had, I would then want to know in what shape assistance was needed. If signal guns were fired I would want to know from the head of that great Department in what form they desire the assistance of the legislative department. Until that is done, I say with great respect to the distinguished Senator from Ohio, I do not know how he or I can formulate a proposition to assist a condition we are not advised of officially.

I stood here last February and advocated a modification of existing law on the subject of the issuance of bonds, to the effect that the Secretary of the Treasury might be authorized to issue bonds of shorter date and lower rate of interest. I believe that the present law, the enactment of 1875, gives the authority today. The Secretary of the Treasury, than whom there is no better lawyer believes the same thing.

better lawyer, believes the same thing.

I happen to have known John G. Carlisle where others, perhaps, have not known him. I have known him in the courts, and he is a lawyer amongst lawyers; not a lawyer on the books, but a lawyer equipped; not a lawyer out of practice, not a lawyer long relieved from the trial of cases; and when he says to me that he believes he has authority under the act of 1875 to issue bonds, I believe him; yet I believe we ought, when we reach that question, to modify that law to the extent of authorizing a shorter bond and one of lower interest, and to do that, not in the interest of the bond buyers or bondholders, but in the interest of the public, in the interest of the taxpayers. I think the Senator from Ohio is right in many portions of his views. I understand him to occupy the position which I do, that if bonds are to be issued they should be issued for shorter terms and at a lower rate of interest, so that the people may take the bonds and deposit them in the savings banks, and that they shall not go into the hands of bankers as the foundation for national banking to the extent they are now doing.

But, sir, "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." We

But, sir, "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." We have no need to jump a ditch until we get to it. When this legislation is completed, when we are free from the incubus which rests upon the public confidence, when the national nightmare is removed, we can then take up the subject in a wholesome way and legislate upon it. Whether it then results in the adoption of the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Berry], or in any other measure, we can address ourselves to it fairly and well.

In the meantime, Mr. President, let me give this assurance, for I do not want to be upon the floor again in this debate: The public credit will be taken care of. Let no man gainsay the safety of our currency or of our obligations under this Administration in the very 1892.

tration in the year 1893.

The Democratic party is devoted to the honor of the country. Its honor is allied to and embedded in the integrity of its finances. Whatever may have been fashionable on the Republican sida heretofore, and on the stump in the way of debate, in showing that among the Democratic Senators are men from the South who had been leaders in the Confederate army, and who care not for the honor of the Government, its money, or its flag, it is not so, gentlemen. We have the courage and the patriotism to stand upon a high level, to protect every element of honor, of integrity, of safety, which has ever been known to this Government, and we shall not falter on the way.

Let the old notions of Republican leader pass away, for they

Let the old notions of Republican leader pass away, for they do not apply to the present condition; they never did apply; and less now than ever before.

There is not a Senator on this side of the Chamber—some of them sit around me with feet in the grave, some of them crippled, halting, coming here upon crutches; but there is not one of them whose fidelity to the national honor is not fully equal, beyond all question of debate or comparison, with that of any Senator who sits upon the other side of the Chamber; and I say it without the slightest hesitation or modification. The Republican party has no longer any monopoly on this subject, and when the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Sherman] sounds the note of alarm and says that something must be done to protect the national credit, I say to him the national credit is in safe hands at this time. Never was it in safer hands.

We may differ and divide amongst ourselves on this side of the Chamber, but we shall do so without acrimony; we shall do so without impugning each other's motives, and on the great touchstone question of national honor we shall come together at a moment's call.

Mr. President, I have been betrayed into saying more than I had expected to say, but I believe I can not dismiss the subject or the occasion without a few parting words to the Senators who come here from the great silver States.

come here from the great silver States.

We have fought a long contest. I have been criticised for my bearing to those men. Great esthetic journals, calling themselves journals of civilization, have criticised me because I have said no abusive words of those gentlemen. These journals have said no abusive words of those gentlemen. These journals have said the time had come to say offensive and had things.

I opened this discussion, as I remarked a little while ago, on the 22d day of August, and I spoke here my sentiments then in regard to the silver States of this Union and their representatives. To-day, as this contest is closing. I wish to repeat by simple reference every word I said of them and to them at that time. They have fought their battle gallantly and well, held their ground; and now, in this parting hour, there is not a manly heart but goes out to such utterances as we listened to last evening from the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. Telles], and again this morning from the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. Wol-cort. Nobody who heard those utterances will feel any vain spirit of triumph in this hour.

I feel, Mr. President, and the men who have acted with me feel, that we have acted for the best interests of the country. On that point others differ from us, but we feel with them, and in the hour of triumph we have nothing but respect for those on this side of the Chamber and on the other side of the Chamber who have held different views

This much, Mr. President, I thought it was becoming in me to say.

Mr. McPHERSON. Mr. President, I have no desire to prolong this discussion; but, unfortunately last evening, in my contention with the honorable Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES], in my desire to convert him from the error of his ways, I was almost put in the position of an obstructionist. I do not propose to repeat that experiment. There seems to be a desire on all sides of the Chamber to proceed to a vote. We have now been here for nearly three months discussing this question; and as the Senate has expressed a desire to vote, and while the spasm the Senate has expressed a deare to vote, and wante the spasm lasts, I do not intend to offer anything by way of delay.

I wish to say, however, in answer to the honorable Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Berry], who has just addressed the Senate, that I want no Illusions upon this question and no deception when the vote shall have been taken. I differ with the honorable Senator that either the Democratic convention, the President, or the friends of repeal in this Chamber have ever advocated the policy of the absolute and unconditional repeal of the Sherman law in its entirety. To repeal the Sherman law in its entirety means-Mr. BERRY. V Will the Senator permit me to ask a question? Mr. McPHERSON. In a moment, when I get through with this sentence To repeal the Sherman law in its entirety means that one hundred and fifty millions of Treasury notes shall be left without a redeemer either in gold or silver. To do such an act as this would leave the Democratic party more in need of a redeemer than the Treasury notes themselves. Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator now permit me to ask a ques-

Mr. McPHERSON. Yes.
Mr. BERRY. The Senator said he denied that the national Democratic convention ever declared in favor of the repeal of the Sherman law. I assert that that declaration has been read fifty times, or at least a large number of times, on the floor of the Senate and from the desk; and there is not one word in the Democratic platform about the purchasing clause of the Sherman

The Senator says the repeal of the Sherman law in its entirety would leave $150,000,000 of Treasury notes unprovided for. I assert that that $150,000,000, if that law be repealed, would be as much provided for as the greenback currency is to-day. They stand precisely on the same footing. The Senator's statement that the $150,000,0 0 of Treasury notes would be unprovided for is, I think, not justified by the law.

repeat that the Democratic platform declared in favor of repealing the Sherman law, and said nothing about the purchasing clause of that law. If the Senator from New Jersey does know that he certainly ought to know it.

Mr. McPHERSON. I do not know it, and I do not think there is a man in this country who does know it, in the sense the Senator now states it, which is in effect to issue one hundred and fifty millions of new paper with no promise of redemption.

Mr. BERRY. If the Senator will read that plank in the Democratic platform he will find that I am correct.

Mr. McPHERSON. It was not the intention of the Democratic convention, or the intention of the friends of repeal upon this side of the Chamber, to imperil in any way, shape, or form the notes issued to the amount of $150,000,000, except by some other coin redemption.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator permit me there?
Mr. McPHERSON. Not at present.
Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator permit me to read from the Democratic platform?

Mr. McPHERSON. I want to say, if the Senator will permit me to finish my sentence Mr. BERRY. All rig

Mr. BERRY. All right.
Mr. McPHERSON. The Democratic platform was a general enunciation of principles. The Democratic platform certainly did not and could not declare a policy which would, after the issue of $150.000,000 of Treasury notes, leave them unprotected by any coin redemption whatever; and I do not want the Democratic platform. eratic party committed to any such policy. I will now hear the Senator.

Mr. BERRY. If the Senator will permit, as he has made a square issue of fact with me as to what the Democratic platform declares, and puts such a construction as he sees proper and which was never intended to be put upon the declaration made by the Democratic convention at Chicago, I shall read it:

SEC. 7. We denounce the Republican legislation known as the Sherman act of 1890 as a cowardly makeshift, fraught with possibilities of danger in the future which should make all of its supporters, as well as its author, anxious for its speedy repeal:

That is all that relates to the repeal of the Sherman law. have heard most remarkable statements made by the Senator from New Jersey on this floor in regard to finances, and they have been usually matters of opinion. This, however, is a question of fact as to the language employed. How can the Senator assert that the Democratic platform declared in favor of the repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman act, when it says in plain language which can not be mistaken:

We denounce the Republican Jerislation known as the Sherman act of 1800.

Mr. McPHERSON. Very well. My answer to the Senator is simply this, that necessarily all platforms of political parties are general enunciations of the principles of the parties. The Democratic convention, after the Sherman law had been three years upon the statute books and after $150,000,000 of Treasury notes had been issued under that law upon deposits of silver bul lion, could not, for a single moment, have believed or thought that it was proper to repeal the whole Sherman law and leave those notes entirely without any protection except a mass of silver bullion and no power even to sell it; and the Democratic convention and no power even to sell it; and the Democratic convention had no such idea. I have never heard such an argument made on this side of the Chamber by the friends of repeal as has been urged by the Senator from Arkansas, that that was the policy of the Democratic party.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from New Jersey if it is not barely possible that the person who wrote that sentence in the Democratic platform did not know what he was writing about and did not work that the person who was the senator and did not know what he was writing about and did not mean anything? [Laughter.]

Mr. McPHERSON. No; I will not say that. That is no argument, let me say to the Senator, and yet it is quite as reasonable as some other statements here made.

Mr. PASCO. I should like to ask the Senator from New Jersey if the statement which he has just made is not an argument against the unconditional repeal of the Sherman act?

Mr. McPHERSON. Not at all. The unconditional repeal of the Sherman law, as we find it in the Senate to-day, is as to the purchase of sliver bullion, and the safety of the Treasury notes we have already issued on the purchases of silver. The Demo-cratic party would be unfaithful to every pledge made to the people, and it would be unfaithful to itself, and surely the Democrutic party did not mean when it made the platform it did in Chicago, that they were to imperil the parity between gold and silver in this country, and leave $150,000,000 of Treasury notes. if the Sherman law had been unconditionally and absolutely repealed, without even a provision which would provide for them a redeemer in silver coin, not to speak of gold coin.

Mr. BUTLER. May I not suggest to the Senator from New Jersey that when that provision was put in the Democratic platform the convention might have contemplated some provision of law which would have taken care of that $150,000,000 of Treasury notes?

Mr. McPHERSON. It contemplated nothing except what it said, that the party favored repeal of the Sherman law. does that mean

Mr. BUTLER. If that is the case, the Senator from Arkansas is right.

Mr. McPHERSON. It means that the purchases of silver bullion under the Sherman law shall be stopped.

Mr. VANCE. Will my good friend from New Jersey allow me to say a word to him?

Mr. McPHERSON. Certainly.

Mr. VANCE. The Chicago platform does not declare for either the repeal, partially or totally, of the Sherman law. It only declares that that law is fraught with such possibilities of danger and such mischiefs in the future that its author ought to denger and such mischiefs in the future that its author ought to be ashamed of himself. [Laughter.] Mr. McPHERSON. I think we have ocular proof that its author is ashamed of himself. It has been charged on the floor of the Senate that it was perhaps owing to a suggestion made by the Senator from Ohio, in an interview last fill in the State of Ohio, that the President of the United States had been induced to recommend the repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherm nlaw.

Now, I wish to say to the honorable Senator from Ohio, that if he has been the cause of this beneficent legislation, if he has fathered it, I hope when history makes up its final and impartial judgment it will exactly divide the honors between the President of the United States and the honorable Senator from Ohio, because, certainly the Democratic platform, if construed in the light of reason, provided for nothing except that we should discontinue the purchases of silver. To say in the presence of 67,000,000 of people in this country, that the Democratic party was so wanting in intelligence, was so wanting in common honesty, that they had incorporated in their platform a provision which required that $150,000,000 of paper money which had been issued should have no redeemer whatever provided for them, is absurd and ridiculous. The Democratic platform left to Congress the express of the legislative powers reconstructed. and ridiculous. The Democratic platform left to Congress the exercise of the legislative powers necessary to enforce the general principles therein enunciated. The intelligence and patriotism of a Democratic Congress was thought quite sufficient to guard the country from such a calamity; and the present Congress is likely to prove equal to the occasion.

Mr. HILL. There seems to be a dispute as to how much the Senate knows in regard to the silver question. If, after three exercities departs are described as the property of the silver question.

months' debate, we do not know all that is to be known on the subject, I think we labor under a grave imputation. In my judgment, we know enough to-day to be able to vote upon this question, and the sooner we take the vote the better. We shall question, and the sooner we take the vote the better. We shall never know any more about the question than we do now.

Mr. BUTLER. I suggest that if the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] does not stop his obstructive tactics I shall have to call upon the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] to apply the cloture. [Laughter.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. BERRY. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PERKINS (when the name of Mr. WHITE of California was called). My colleague [Mr. WHITE of California] is paired upon this question with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY]; but that pair has been transferred to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER]. My colleague if present would vote "yea" on this question, and I am informed the Senator from New Hampshire would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded. Mr. PUGH. I wish to announce that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. Colquitt] would vote "yea" if he were present and not paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON].

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated. The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add after the word "repealed," in line 13, the following:

pealed," In line 10, the lollowing.

Provided, That hereafter standard silver shall be coined at the several mints of the United States into dollars, half dollars quarter dollars, and dimes, at the present ratio of legrains of standard silver to 1 grain of standard gold, under the same conditions as to mintage and other charges that are now or may hereafter be in force with reference to the coinage of gold. And it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, without necessary delay, to cause all uncoined silver bullion owned by the Government of the United States to be coined into standard silver dollars. All money coined under the provisions of this act shall be a full legal tender for all debts, public and mylvate. lic and private

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment. The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. QUAY (when Mr. CAMERON'S name was called). I again announce the pair of my colleague [Mr. CAMERON] with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON].

Mr. COCKRELL. I announce for the day that my pair with the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] has been transferred to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL]. That leaves the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] and myself free to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. PALMER (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH]. If he were present I should vote "nay."

Mr. QUAY (when his name was called). My pair with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] having been transferred to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] I vote "nay."

This arrangement is to extend throughout the session to-day.

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 31, nays 41; as follows:

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Florida to be allowed to withdraw his vote? The Chair hears none.

I desire to submit an amendment, which Mr. BLACKBURN. is on the Secretary's desk. I ask that it may be now read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to the bill the following:

SEC. 2. That on and after the 1st day of January, 1894, any mine owner or smelter producing silver which is derived exclusively from mines situated in the United States or its Territories, and which is of the required fineness, may present the same at any of the mints of the United States, and the same shall be coined free into silver dollars of the present standard, except the seigniorage hereinafter provided for, if presented in sums not less than $100.
SEC. 3. That on the ist day of each mouth the Secretary of the Treasury shall establish the seigniorage for each following month.
SEC. 4. That the seigniorage for each following month.
SEC. 4. That the seigniorage for each of lowing month.
SEC. 5. That the seigniorage for the coining silver shall be the difference between the market price of silver builton and the minted value after coined, which seligniorage shall not be coined but shall be sold by the Secretary of the Treasury in open market, at home or abroad, at the highest price for gold, which gold shall be held in the Treasury and used only for the purpose of maintaining parity between the two metals.

SEC 5. That in fixing or establishing the seignlorage the average price of silver sold by him the month preceding shall control, when he has sold any; otherwise the average price in the cities of London and New York.

SEC 6. That in order to protect the mints against imposition no silver shall be coined under this act except such as is produced by smelters situated in the United States, and shall be stamped, marked, or molded as directed by the Secretary of the Treasury, who is hereby authorized to appoint such officers or agents and fix their compensation and prescribe such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry this act into effect. SEC 7. That the silver bullion sold as heretofore provided shall have its carmarks removed and shall, after sale, loss its privilege.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. President, I shall offer this amendment, not as a substitute for that portion of the pending bill which it proposes to strike out, but to come in as additional to the bill, should it be agreed to by the Senate.

the bill, should it be agreed to by the Senate.

Mr. President, during the long debate which has occurred here over this measure, I am sure the RECORD bears me out in the assertion that I have taken up but very little of the time of the Senate. For many weary weeks I have been persistently engaged in trying to get this matter to a vote, and to get it disposed of and settled. I do not intend to ask the indulgence of the Senate in the discussion of the proposed amendment. It has been printed and upon the desks of Senators for three weeks past. I only wish to say that if the right of coinage is to be given to the silver metal at all, I believe that the amendment now submitted guards the Government and its Treasury as carefully as may be done in the process of the mintage of the metal. may be done in the process of the mintage of the metal.

The one feature of the amendment to which I ask the atten-

The one feature of the amendment to which I ask the attention of the Senate is the determination of the seigniorage, my effort being to establish a self-adjusting process. The seigniorage proposed in the amendment consists of the difference between the bullion value and the coin value of the silver metal, that difference to be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury upon the first day of each month. If the silver metal shall appreciate in value, the seigniorage, of course, depreciates in amount, but if the parity of value between the two metals is what is sought for, that is absolutely secured, because the seigniorage is not fixed arbitrarily at 10 per cent, as heretofore, nor 20 per is not fixed arbitrarily at 10 per cent, as heretofore, nor 20 per cent, nor 25 per cent, but the seigniorage is the difference in value to be established every month by the Secretary of the Treasury between the bullion value of the metal and the value after it has been coined.

I believe that, if Senators will examine the amendment, they will find that every safeguard is thrown around the mint to protect it from imposition. The purpose and object of the amendment is to give unlimited coinage to silver metal, the product of American mines, and to fix the seigniorage on the basis indi-cated. To that proposition I invite the attention of the Senate. There is but one other salient feature in this amendment, and

There is but one other salient feature in this amendment, and that is that the seigniorage is to be sold in the open markets of the world for the highest price in gold, and that gold is to be held as a reserve fund in the Treasury for no purpose except to maintain the parity in value between these two metals.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I am very anxious to vote upon any proposition looking to retaining silver in any form in our circulation, but I see serious objection to this amendment in this: That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to sell the bullion in open market, and that he is also authorized to fix the market price. My experience with Secretaries of the Treasury is such that I think a law of this kind would not only be futile—

Mr. BLACKBURN. If the Senator from Nevada will permit me simply to correct his statement there, I will say that the provision of the proposed amendment is, not that the Secretary of the Treasury shall fix the market price of the silver bullion, but that it shall be determined on the first day of each month by the average price paid the preceding month, and if no sale has been made during the month preceding, then the value shall be fixed from the average prices ruling in the London and New York markets for the preceding thirty days.

Mr. STEWART. The Secretary of the Treasury has too much to do with it. I know the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to abrogate laws. If the Secretary happens to be a gold man he will dump the bullion on the market and smash it. I think this would be trifling with the question. I do not wish to argue about the matter; but I am afraid of the Secretary of the Treasury since the failure of the Department to execute the Bland-Allisonact and the Sherman act. The Secretary has too much power son act and the Snerman act. The Secretary has too much power in throwing bullion upon the market. I am afraid he will be speculating with it, and fooling with it, and making a lot of money by bulling and bearing the market. I think we had better not adopt this amendment. I regret very much to vote against it, but I do not think it will do.

M. WASHBURN. I call for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amedment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to the bill the follow-

Ing:
SEC.—. That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to invite the several Governments of the Republics of Mexico, Central and South America, Haiti, and Santo Domingo to join the United States in a conference to be held in Washington, in the United States, within nine months from the passage of this act, for the purpose of the "adoption of a common silver coin to be issued by each government, the same to be a legal tender in all commercial transactions between the citizens of all the American States" represented in the conference; and when such common coin shall have been agreed upon by the majority of the governments so invited and participating in such conference shall have been opened to the free and unlimited coinage of the common silver coin so agreed upon by the conference for the benefit of depositors of silver builion, the United States will also open its mints to the free and unlimited coinage of such common silver coin.

Mr. SQUIRE. I offer the amendment of which I heretofore gave notice, and ask that it may be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert:

acting clause of the bill and insert:

That hereafter any owner of silver bullion, the product of mines or refineries located in the United States, may deposit the same at any mint of the United States, to be formed into standard dollars of the present weight and tineness, for his benefit, as hereinafter stated; but it shall be lawful to refuse any deposit of less value than $100, or any bullion so base as to be unsuitable for the operation of the mint: Provided, however. That there shall only be delivered or pild to the porson depositing said silver bullion such number of standard silver dollars as shall equal the commercial value of said silver bullion on the day of deposit, as ascertained and determined by the Secretary of the Treasury; the difference, if any, between the mint or coin value of said standard silver dollars and the commercial value of the silver bullion that deposited shall be retained by the Government as seignforage, and the gain or seigniorage arising from such coinage shall be accounted for and paid into the Treasury: Provided, That the deposite of silver bullion for coinage into silver dollars under the provisions of this act shall not exce d the sum of $2.000,000 per month. The amount of such seigniorage of gain shall be retained in the Treasury as a reserve fund in silver dollars, or such other form of equivalent lawful money as the Secretary of the Treasury may from time to time direct, for the purpose of maintaining the parity of value of every silver dollar, issued under the provisions of this act, with the gold dollar issued by the United States: Provised further, That when the number of standard silver dollars shall be a legal tender in all payments at their nominal or coin value.

of this act, with the gold dollar issued by the United States: Provided Jurtens: That when the number of standard sliver dollars coined under the foregoing provision shall reach the sum of $100,000,000 then all further coinage of silver dollars shall cease.

SEC 2. That the said silver dollars shall be a legal tender in all payments at their nominal or coin value.

SEC 3. That no certificate shall be issued to represent the silver dollars coined under the provisions of this act.

SEC 4. That so much of the act approved July 14, 1890, entitled "An act directing the purchase of silver buillion and the issue of Treasury notes thereon, and for other purposes," as directs the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase from time to time silver buillion to the aggregate amount of 4,800, 000 ounces, or so much thereof as may be offered in each month at the market price thereof, not exceeding $i$ for $71.25$ grains of pure silver, and to issue in payment for such purchases Treasury notes of the United States, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

SEC 5. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue, sell, and dispose of, at not less than par in coin, bonds of the United States bearing interest not to exceed $i$ per cent per annum, payable semiannually, and redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after five years from their date, with like qualities, privileges, and exemptions provided for the bonds at present authorized, to the extent of $200,000.00, and to use the proceeds thereof for the purpose of maintaining all the money of the United States at par with the gold dollar.

SEC 6. That hereafter national banking associations shall be entitled to receive from the Comptroller of the Currency, upon compliance with all other terms and requirements of law therefor, circulating notes of different dencainations, in blank, registered and countersigned as required by law, to the value at par of the United States bonds on deposit with the Treasurer in trust for the association. Provided. That the aggregat

Mr. SQUIRE. I propose to make a change in two places in the text of the amendment in regard to the rate of interest on the bonds and the time for which they shall run. I would modify the amendment by making the rate of interest 3 per cent, and the number of years for which the bonds shall run three instead of five, and I ask the Senate to take a vote on the first two sections of the amendment separately, not including the questions of bonds or the additional national-bank circulation; and then I shall ask for separate votes on the bind section and the section authorizing national-bank circulation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington desires his amendment to be divided.

Mr. SQUIRE. I do not desire to go into any long discussion, and shall not occupy more than a minute or two. I simply wish to state to the Senate that in drafting the amendment originally I consulted with leading men on both sides of this Chamber, irrespective of party. I consulted with the advocates of free silver, and particularly with the leading authority on that side of the question, who has been a sort of guide, philosopher, and friend to me for many years. I re'er to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. Teller]. As I then understood, the amendment then met with his approval. I also submitted it to the man whom we all reverence as a great financier on the conservative side of this question, the great Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], though Ohio has also another great Senator on this floor. While I do not wish to state that either of the Senators I have named have committed themselves to vote for the amendment, yet I understood them to approve of my offering it.

My object in working with reference to the production of this amendment was to get to a result which at that time it did not seem we should be able to do, and to secure from the silver men all the concessions they were disposed to make and from the gold men, if I may call them such, all the concessions they might be willing to make, so that we could unite upon something which would be fair, honorable, just, and practicable.

Mr. BERRY. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. SQUIRE. I will be glad to answer the Senator.

Mr. BERRY. Do I understand the first two sections, on which the Sen iter asks a vote, do not contain any provision for bonds?

Mr. SQUIRE. No provision for bonds. At the suggestion of the Senator from Colorado, I stopped at the first and second sec tions. I should prefer that the third section should also be adopted, which provides that no certificates shall be issued to represent the silver dellars coined under the provisions of this act; but I stopped short of that. I do not wish to embarrass the question by including that at this time.

I ask the Senate to vote on the first two sections; and on that Task for the yeas and nays.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington.

Mr. HOAR. Let it be read again.

Mr. MILLS. The two sections to be voted on.
Mr. SQUIRE. Let the Secretary read the two sections to be voted on

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The first and second sections of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington will be

The Secretary read as follows:

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington [Mr. SQUIRE], on which the yeas and nays have been demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GRAY (when his name was called). On this and all kindred questions I am paired with the Senator from California Mr. WHITE, and I make the announcement for the last time to-day that my pair has been transferred to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER]. I vote "nay."

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SQUIRE. Mr. President, the vote on this proposition has only emphasized the fact that the remarks of the Senator from Indiana were entirely correct when he said that no matter what merit there might be in separate propositions, he did not pro-pose to have any amendment made; and I may say that in private conversation he made to me the remark that not even if the Ten Commandments were proposed as an amendment, or anything as affirmatively good as they are believed to be, would there be an adoption of any such amendment.

Two days ago I had the honor of speaking to the Senate in advocacy of this amendment as a whole, and I dweltat some length on the subject of the national credit and the necessity that exists, in my judgment, for giving the Secretary of the Treasury authority to issue and dispose of the bonds of the United States Government. At that same time I then discussed earnestly the propriety of authorizing an extension of the national-bank circulation up to the par value of the United States bonds held by these institutions for that purpose. Mr. WOLCOTT. I rise to ask what is before the Senate?

Mr. SQUIRE. My proposed amendment, and I wish to withdraw it. This remark is preliminary to that request. I am explaining the amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. I rise to a question of order. The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee will

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee will state his question of order.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Washington offered an amendment consisting of several propositions. He asked for a division. There were only two sections of his amendment voted upon. I voted for two sections. There are other features that I do not intend to be committed to. I would not have voted for his whole amendment. The rest of his amendment remains to be disposed of.

be disposed of. Mr. SQUIRE. Mr. President, that is what I was about to explain, that I propose now under these circumstances to withdraw the subsequent sections. I ask leave of the Sen ite to withdraw the remainder of the amendment for the reason that no matter what the merit may be regarding the bond proposition or that relative to authorizing the extension of the national-bank circulation to the par value of the bonds, I do not think the spirit and temper of the Senate are such at this time that the spirit and temper of the Senate are such at this time that the vote would be indicative of the opinion of Senators as to the merits of the real questions involved in each of those sections. Therefore, with the leave of the Senate, I shall withdraw the latter portions of my amendment. At a later date these questions will come up and be considered. I do not wish now to obstruct action upon the main question by reason of debating any question sub-dilary to the main issue. It is not opportune.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I object.

Mr. STEWART. I object to withdrawing it after the Senate has acted on a part of the amendment. I rise to a point of order. The Senator from Washington has no right to withdraw his

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. HOAR. I move to lay the appeal on the table. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. I gave notice of an amendment to the bill—the amendment providing for the repeal of what is known as the 10 per cent tax on State bank circulation. After consultation with the Senator from Indiana and other Senators favorable to the amendment, I have concluded not to press it upon the pending bill. I am assured by the Senator from Indiana that the Committee on Finance will give it prompt consideration as a separate measure, and report it to the Senate. Inasmuch as the indications are that it would be defeated here, possibly by the votes of some Senators who are in favor of it, I shall not insist upon it at this time, and ask leave to withdraw it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. PEFFER. I move an amendment to be inserted immediately.

diately after the repealing clause.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Add after the word "repealed" in line 13 of the amendment of the committee already agreed to:

of the amendment of the committee already agreed to:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be prepared immediately Treasury notes to the amount of $250,000,000, said notes to be in form, dimensions, and general appearance similar to those which have been prepared under the provisions of the act of July 14, 1890. They shall be of the denominations of 18, 22, 25, 30, and $20, one-fifth part in value of the total issue to be in each of said denominations; they shall be made payable in lawful money; they shall be received by the Governmen of the United States, and the officers thereof. for taxes and all public dues, and they shall be lawful money and legal tender, at their face value, in payment of debts to any amount whatever.

Sec. 3. That said notes shall be printed on paper of the same character quality, and grade as that now used for United States notes; they shall be prepared in accordance with laws, rules, and regulations now in force applicable to such work, and as fast as they are ready for delivery they shall be deposited in the Treasury and treate I as so much available cash, and they shall be paid out the same as other public moneys.

Sec. 4. That when any of said notes are received in the Treasury in the course of business, they shall be reissued and thus kept in circulation.

Sec. 5. That this act shall take effect immediately after its passage.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. PEFFER. Mr. President, the Senate will see from the language of the amendment that it simply proposes the issue of $250,000,000 of Treasury notes payable in lawful money, and that the notes shall be receivable for taxes and all public dues, and shall be legal tender in the payment of all debts to whatever amount.

Mr. BATE. We can not hear a word on this side.

Mr. PEFFER. The amendment provides for the issuance of $250,000,000 of Treasury notes in the denominations mentioned in the amendment, payable in lawful money, and it provides that they shall be receivable for taxes and all public dues and be legal tender in the payment of debts to any amount whatever. Whenever they are received in the Treasury in the regular course of business the amendment provides that they shall be reissued and kept in circulation; in other words, that they shall be placed as nearly as possible upon the plane of the greenbacks which are now in circulation.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator a question? Do I understand him to say that when these notes are issued they will themselves be lawful money?

Mr. PEFFER. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOAR. Then if one of these notes, say a twenty-dollar Mr. HOAR. Then it one of these notes, say a twenty-dollar note, be presented to the Treasury it will be redeemable in other notes of the same kind?

Mr. PEFFER. In lawful money.

Mr. HOAR. A twenty-dollar note issued under this amendment would be redeemable in the Treasury in ten-dollar notes, or five-dollar notes of the same issue.

Mr. PEFFER. Or anything that is lawful money.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator understands then that these notes being a legal tender-

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask the Senator to speak louder; we can

Mr. HOAR. I want to understand the financial theories of the Senator from Kansas. The Senator understands then that these notes are to be lawful money, as he has said, and therefore if one of them is presented to the Treasury, say a twenty-dollar note, it may be redeemed by the Treasury in ten-dollar, or five-dollar, or one-dollar notes of the same issue, as lawful money. Is that the Senator's purpose?

Mr. PEFFER. It may be paid in lawful money, whatever kind of lawful money the Treasury has on hand, which can be used for any purpose, no matter whether it be gold, silver, or

Mr. HOAR. Or paper?
Mr. PEFFER. Or paper.
The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read again.

Mr. BATE. On this side of the Chamber we could not hear the explanation of the Senator from Kansas, and it is impossible to understand his amendment as read at the desk. We are called upon here to vote upon a proposition to issue $250,000,000, and I demand that we shall understand it before we act upon it. It has not been printed and laid on our tables. It seems to me we are legislating in the dark. This is a very important question. It has not been submitted to us in print, and I think it ought to be discussed. I suggest that it be printed and go over until Monday so that we may understand it. I make a motion to that

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President-

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair was unable to hear the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. BATE. I ask permission of the Senator from Kansas, who has introduced the amendment, to let it go over until Monday, and in the meantime have it printed that we may understand it. We have not been able to hear it on this side of the Chamber. I shall not vote on a measure involving $250,000,000 unless I understand it; and we have a right to understand it.

Mr. VOORHEES. The suggestion of the Senator from Tennessee calls for a statement from me which I have been thinking of making at intervals this afternoon.

I should like to get the amendments behind us this afternoon if we can, running on to a reasonable, not an unreasonable hour this evening, voting upon amendments and disposing of them. I should not like to have amendments go over until Monday. Though it may be that one or two may do so, I would rather not.

Though it may be that one or two may do so, I would rather not. I desire to state, not by way of asking for an agreement (for I understand there are Senators on the floor who do not wish to seem to be a party to any agreement as to the time to vote), that I expect and hope and shall ask for a vote at 2 o'clock on Monday upon the main bill. I give this notice so that Senators may govern themselves accordingly as to their presence here, and as to what they may want to do in regard to the measure.

But in the meantime and until an hour or so hence I should

But in the meantime, and until an hour or so hence, I should be glad to dispose of all the amendments we can, so that they shall not be in our way on Monday. I think we can very reasonably expect to dispose of the bill Monday afternoon, and I mention Monday at 2 o'clock as a reasonable time. It might run along until 4. I shall earnestly expect and ask for a vote on Monday afternoon upon the bill, so that we may have it be-

Mr. MILLS. Let us vote on the pending amendment now.
Mr. FRYE. Yes; let us vote on the amendment.
Mr. VOORHEES. I hope a vote will be taken now.
The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment Mr. MILLS. Mr. FRYE.

proposed by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. PEFFER. The request made by the Senator from Tennessee to have the amendment laid over until Monday morning and in the meantime printed I think is a very proper one. I do not believe that it will delay the proceedings at all, for I think that if it is printed so that Senators can have a little time to read it they will be prepared to vote upon it without a moment's discussion, and I shall have nothing whatever to say. I hope that the request of the Senator from Tennessee will be granted.

Mr. HARRIS. I want to ask the Senator if his amendment is not already in print? [Exhibiting acopy of S. 595, introduced by Mr. Peffer.] Has he modified it or changed it since it was

Mr. PEFFER. No, I do not think it has been modified. Since the Senator calls my attention to it, it is in print, so that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. Bate] can have it by asking a page to go for it. I had forgotten about it.

Mr. HOAR. I do not desire to prolong the debate, and I do not intend to do so; but I think it is important, after the part the Senator from Kansas has taken in the various discussions, that we should understand and the country should understand the financial theory which he represents.

This is a proposition to issue $250,000,000 of currency, to be legal tender for all debts, past and future, which is to be redeemable in itself. The Government is to be under no obligation, if a $20 bill of this currency so issued be taken to the Treasury for redemption, to redeem it in anything except two $10 bills, or four $5 bills, or twenty $1 bills of the same issue, the same kind of money

So it is irredeemable money, pure and simple. It differs from the greenbacks of the war (which it was intended to redeem when the Government had the power), by declaring on its face in substance that it is never to be redeemed, that is, unless the Government please; that there shall never be any obligation to redeem it. I think it important (as I have put the question to redeem it. I think it important (as I have put the question to the Senator whether that is his meaning and he has answered that it is) that his views should be understood.

Mr. PEFFER. In answer to the Senator from Massachusetts, I will state to him and to the Senate that my views are precisely the same as those of Mr. Secretary Chase, Mr. President Lincoln and all the greatmen of that time who were the fathers of the kind of currency of which I hold a sample in my hands. I read upon the face of it as follows:

The United States will pay to bearer one dollar.

Nothing more; nothing less. That is my theory; that is my

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, his proposition is in substance that the United States will not pay to bearer $1.

Mr. PEFFER. Then this is a lie on the greenback, Mr.

President President.

Mr. DOLPH. The position of the Senator from Kansas is that the Government shall issue its promissory note, and when it is presented for payment it shall be paid by giving another promissory note of the same kind, the same tenor, issued at the same time; that it shall be its promise to pay money by making another promise or renewing its note. But I think the Senator from Kansas is getting inconsistent with himself. If I have understood his argument during this long discussion, it has been that the stamp of the Government and the legal-tender been that the stamp of the Government and the legal-lender quality of money are what give it value, and it is not necessary that it shall be redeemable at all. Why he should put in here a provision for redemption if he is going to have the promise the Government issued to serve as money I can not understand.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, this is the legitimate fruit of the destruction of one of the precious metals. It presents an issue which you can not avoid, and an issue which has been accepted by which you can not avoid, and an issue which has been accepted by other countries. It is irredeemable paper or no money. When you destroy the money of redemption the people must have money and they are forced to accept irredeemable money. Russia has irredeemable money. She circulates no gold and very little silver, but issues irredeemable paper, and has prosperity. The English Government has undertaken to have between $1,000,000, 000 and $1,200,000,000 of irredeemable money in India. body knows that after having destroyed silver as a value money there is nothing in which to redeem the rupees and rupee paper of India except the rupee paper and rupees of India. It is irre-deemable in anything but itself; and all of the discussion in regard to the redemption of the rupee has been to the effect that it was impossible for them to get gold and put it behind the circulating medium of India.

We have agreed to dispense with silver. There is now no way of giving the people money except to create paper money of ultimate payment; in other words, paper money which is not a promise or a debt, but is itself money; and that is the issue before the The people will not submit to putting out paper, which tis a promise to redeem, when there is nothing with which to redeem it. In this Hall we hear to-day of buying gold to redeem both paper and silver, to enrich the few and enslave the many. That has been the song all along. That is the song of the speculator who has gold to sell or has bonds payable in gold, which are gold futures. His object is to make money scarce and dear. But the American people will have money. You have destroyed the kind of money in which paper was redeemable; and it is idle to talk about redeeming it in something that does not exist or can not be procured.

It has been admitted by all the financiers for years that there was not gold enough. Your Secretaries of the Treasury have admitted that. Nearly every man who has spoken has admitted that there is not gold enough for the purposes of redemption. Then why talk of redemption when you have no material in which to redeem? You have destroyed your material of redemption, and the only logical result is to let the paper redeem itself. We have relied for thousands of years upon rude nature to limit the nave relied for thousands of years upon rude nature to limit the quantity of gold and silver to prevent excessive circulation and inflation. Rude nature has contracted it enough, but latterly the ingenuity and greed of man has doubled that contraction and destroyed the automatic theory by demonetizing silver.

This is the legitimate offspring of the demonstization of silver. The only use of gold and silver is limitation of quantity. We

Why were gold and silver supposed to be better than paper? Simply because their quantity is limited by the rude forces of nature, and not by the caprice of legislation. If legislation must regulate the quantity of metallic money, by rejecting either of the precious metals in the interest of money changers, why may not legislation regulate the quantity of paper money in the interest of the people? When you have destroyed the limitation which nature decrees by striking down silver, you have proved that there is nothing sacred in the precious metals; that either or both may be dispensed with by legislation.

Because we in the mountains are compelled to abandon silver mining, we do not want to see the rest of the country suffer as we suffer. But they must suffer equally with us if they are denied money. There is no other kind of money left when silver is destroyed but paper redeemable in itself, and in nothing else, for there is nothing else in which to redeem it.

there is nothing else in which to redeem it.

The amendment of the Senator from Kansas is the only legical result of the vote just taken against the free coinage of silver. I shall vote with pleasure for his amendment, because I believe that the people must have money or be destroyed. I shall vote for his amendment as the logical result of the repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman act. If silver can not be restored, gold must be demonstized, and paper money of ultimate payment substituted for coin to preserve civilization.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEFFER].

Mr. DOLPH. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BATE. I moved the postponement of the amendment until Monday, that it might be printed. The proposition I made was accepted by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CULLOM and others. Too late.

Mr. FAULKNER. It strikes me the suggestion of the Senator from Tennessee is out of order. As long as the amendment was pending it had to come to a vote unless it was withdrawn. It was not withdrawn, and consequently we are now in the process of voting upon it.

Mr. CULLOM. Let the roll call proceed.

Mr. BATE. My motion was made before the vote commenced.

I understood the Senator from Kansas to agree to my proposition. He agreed that the amendment should be withdrawn until Monday, and desired it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senaator from Tennessee that he did not hear the motion of the Senabut the motion would not have been in order.

The SECRETARY. Add to the bill the following additional sections:

Sections:

Section 1. That from and after the date and passage of this act the unit of value in the United States shall be the dollar, and the same may be coined of 412 grains of standard silver, or 25.8 grains of standard gold; and the said coin shall be legal tender for all debts, public and private. That hereafter any owner of silver bullion may deposit the same at any mint of the United States, which deposit, less 20 per cent, which shall be deducted therefrom as seigniorage, shall be coined into standard dollars for his benefit and without other charge for coinage than said deduction as seigniorage; which seigniorage shall be coined into standard dollars and covered into the Treasury; but it shall be lawful to refuse any deposit of less value than $100, or any bullion so base as to be unsuitable for the operation of the mint.

SEC. 2. That the provision of section 3 of "An act to authorize the coinage of the standard silver dollar and to restore its legal-tender character," which became a law February 28, 1878, is hereby made applicable to the coinage in this act provided for.

SEC. 3. That the certificates provided for in the second section of this act shall be denominations of not less than one nor more than one hundred dollars, and such certificates shall be receemable in coin of standard value. A sufficient sum to carry out the provisions of this act is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 4. That the certificates provided for in this act and all silver and gold certificates issued, shall be receivable for all taxes and dues to the United States of every description, and shall be a legal tender for the payment of all debts, public and private.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PEFFER. I offer an amendment and ask that it may come in after the repealing clause.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "repealed," in line 13 of the amendment already agreed to, insert:

SEC. 2. And beit further enacts. That all coins and paper now classication.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacts, That all coins and paper now circulating among the people as currency, including gold coin, silver coin, gold certificates, silver certificates, United States notes, Treasury notes, and national currency shall, according to their several denominations, be of equal exchangeable value and purchasing power; they shall be receivable for taxes and all public dues, and they shall be lawful money and legal tender in payment of debts to any amount whatever.

Mr. PEFFER. Mr. President, this amendment proposes to incorporate in the law the declarations of both of the old polittical party platforms, to make every dollar of our currency, whether it be gold, silver, or paper, equal with every other dollar. In order that there may be no mistake about it in the future and that we shall not have any discussions upon the meaning of the platforms, I propose to incorporate their language into the law. That is what is proposed in this amendment and nothing more.

Mr. McPHERSON. I wish to call attention to the fact that the very proposition the Senator from Kansas now offers is twice repeated in the amendment reported by the Senator from Indiana f. om the Committee on Finance, which has been agreed to.

Mr. PEFFER. Very well, let it be repeated again, if the Senate wishes to do it. I ask for the yeas and nays upon agreeing to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. Peffer].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARRIS. I believe I will ask the Secretary to read an amendment that I gave notice I would offer, but I do not think I shall ask the Senate at this late hour to vote upon it. It is an amendment that I prepared in a broad spirit of compromise, not even satisfactory to myself, but I want to put it on record.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as re-

The SECRETARY. Strike out all from line 14, page 2, to line 26, inclusive, and insert the following:

That the seigniorage or profit fund which has resulted from the purchase or coinage of sliver bullion shall be coined into sliver dollars of standard weight and fineness, with full legal-tender quality, at the rate of not less than $5,000,000 per month, and such dollars shall be covered into the Treas-than $3,000,000 per month, and such dollars shall be covered into the Treasury.

SEC. 2. That when all the seigniorage or profit-fund bullion shall have been coined as required by the first section of this act, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase each month sliver bullion at the market value in quantities sufficient to coin not less than — dollars each and every month: and he is he eby directed to coin the said bullion monthly, as fast as purchased, into standard sliver dollars, and a sum sufficient to carry into effect the provisions of this act is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 3. That when any papercirculating notes or certificates of whatsoever character, of denominations less than $10, issued under authority of the United States, except national-bank notes or certificates redeemable only in silver dollars, shall be received at the Treasury or any subreasury, they shall not be reissued, but shall be assorted, counted, and recorded, and immediately destroyed in accordance with existing provisions of law; and a rapidly as said notes or certificates are destroyed they shall be replaced by an equal amount of like notes or certificates of denominations not less than $10.

SEC. 4. That hereafter no national-bank note shall be issued of a less dean equal amount of like notes or certificates of denominations not less than $10.

SEC. 4. That hereafter no national-bank notes shall be issued of a less denomination than $10, and all such national-bank notes, when received at the Treasury or any subtreasury, shall be destroyed in accordance with law; and the national banking associations whose notes are destroyed under the provisions of this section shall be respectively required to substitute notes of denominations not less than $10 in lieu of those dest oyed.

SEC. 5. That from and after the passage of this act the coinage of the two and one-half dollar gold piece and the five-dollar gold piece is hereby prohibited, and the coins above-named shall not be struck or issued by the Mint of the United States; and such coins when received at the Treasury or any subtreasury shall be withdrawn from circulation and received into eagles and double eagles, in accordance with law.

SEC. 6. That the holder of any standard silver dollars which have been may be coined may deposit the same with the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States in any sum, and receive therefor notes of denominations less than $10 only, which notes shall have the same legal-tender quality as the coin for which they are exchanged. The coin deposited for or representing the said notes shall be retained in the Treasury for the payment of the same on demand.

Mr. HARRIS. I left the blank as to the amount of silver that should be monthly purchased and coined in order that any or every Senator might test the sense of the Senate as to such amount. But knowing as I know now that the decree has been entered that no amendment of any character is to be made to the bill, I will not subject the Senate to a vote upon my amendment or any phase of it. I decline to offer it or to ask a vote upon it, but simply desire to put it upon record as an amendment sug gested in a broad spirit of compromise on a question about which there are very honest differences of opinion. It is not entirely satisfactory to myself, and I suppose would not be entirely satisfactory to any other Senator.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there is no further amendment as in Committee of the Whole the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. STEWART. I hope that will not be done. The Senator from Indiana does not propose to take a final vote on the bill to-

Mr. STEWART. Very well.

Mr. FAULKNER. I suggest to the Senator from Nevada, that if there is no objection, it would be well to let the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole be concurred in in the Senate and then stop there, so that it will be open fully to amendment on Monday.

Mr. STEWART. And stand as the original bill?

Mr. VOORHEES. That is right

Mr. PASCO. I have an amendment to submit which I desire to have printed, and I shall offer it on Monday morning. I have no objection to the arrangement suggested by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. VOORHEES. Let it be printed. The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed.

Mr. PASCO. I send the amendment to the desk and ask that it be printed.

ENGROSSMENT AND ENROLLMENT OF BILLS.

Mr. GORMAN. I ask consent to report back from the Committee on Printing the concurrent resolution passed by the House of Representatives providing for the printing of bills and joint resolutions in lieu of engrossing the same. The resolution proposes a very radical change in the practice of the Senate so far as it relates to the engrossment of bills. It is a resolution which came from the Joint Commission to Inquire into the Status of the Laws Organizing the Executive Departments, etc. The Committee on Printing direct me to report back the resolution without recommendation.

ing. Mr. GORMAN. Mr. GORMAN. As I stated, there was referred to the Committee on Printing the concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives relating to the printing of bills and resolutions in lieu of engrossing the same, proposing a very radical change in this respect. The concurrent resolution originated with the commission appointed under an act at the last session of Congress, of which the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. Cock-RELL] is chairman on the part of the Senate. The Committee on Printing simply report the resolution back to the Senate without recommendation, preferring that it shall be considered by the Senate. I ask that it be placed on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The concurrent resolution will be placed on the Calendar without recommendation.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE presented a petition of Typographical Union, No. 72, of Lansing, Mich., praying for the erection of a Government Printing Office to be built by day's work under the direction of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. CULLOM. I present resolutions adopted by the Congregational Ministers' Union, of Chicago, Ill., consisting of 170 city and suburban ministers of the Gospel, respectfully and unani-mously praying for the repeal of the so-called Geary Chinese law. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. I present the memorial of C. T. Crook, W. H.
Windle, J. G. Smith, and 117 other citizens of Fort Mill, S. C., remonstrating against the unconditional repeal of the silver-purchasing clause of the so-called Sherman law, as being against the interests of the country. I move that the memorial lie on the

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BERRY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3627) granting certain lands to the Territory of Arizona, reported it without amendment.

Mr. GRAY. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3687) to amend an act entitled, "An act to prohibit | the coming of Chinese persons into the United States," approved May 5, 1892, to report it without amendment. out amendment.

Mr. PERKINS. I desire that the bill may be made a special order for Wednesday next, after the morning business. My purpose for fixing that date for its consideration is that my colleague [Mr. WHITE] is coming to this city as fast as the loco-motive can bring him for the purpose of speaking upon the measure

Mr. GRAY. I suppose there will be no objection to the request of the Senator from California.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from California?

Mr. HOAR. I must object. I think this a bill of vast consequence; or, rather, I will not say that; I will withdraw that statement and say that it relates to a subject of vast consequence. I do not know what the bill may contain; but in view of the fact that the Senate is concluding a heated debate, and the present subject is not yet out of the way, I think it better that the bill shall go to the Calendar. I will say to the Senator from California that it requires a two-thirds vote of the Senate to make a special order, while a majority of the Senate may take up a at any moment.

Mr. PERKINS. I have no objection to the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts. If there is any objection to my request, I withdraw it. I only desired to explain my reasons for making the request. The bill may go to the Calendar, and then I sha'l move to take it up later.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection that order will be made.

will be made.

REPORT OF LIBRARIAN OF CONGRESS.

Mr. MILLS, from the Committee on the Library, presented the annual report of the Librarian of Congress for the calendar year 1892, and submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That the annual report of the Librarian of Congress for the calendar year 1892 be printed, and that 500 extra copies, with covers, be printed for distribution by the Librarian.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. BUTLER introduced a bill (S. 1136) to provide for a governmental telegraph system; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

PRINTING OF CORRESPONDENCE ON SEIGNIORAGE.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask an order to print the correspondence between myself and the Secretary of the Treasury in regard to seigniorage on silver. I think it is important. I move that the correspondence be referred to the Committee on Finance, and that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. Towles, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4177) to provide for further urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for other purposes, asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SAYERS, Mr. LIVINGSTON, and Mr. CANNON of Illinois managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were the routing enrolled of the Arabi they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (H.R. 1986) to amend section 6 of the act approved March 3, 1891, entitled "An act to repeal timber-culture laws, and for other purposes;"

A bill (H.R. 3421) providing for the construction of a steam revenue cutter for the New England coast; and A joint resolution (H. Res. 55) for the reporting, marking, and removal of derelicts.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on the deficiency appropriation bill which has just been received.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4177) to provide for further urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon. greeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to. By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. Cock-RELL, Mr. GORMAN, and Mr. CULLOM were appointed.

PURCHASE OF SILVER BULLION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1) to repeal a part of an act approved July 14, 1890, entitled "An act directing the purchase of silver bullion and the issue of Treasury notes thereon, and for other purposes."

Mr. HUNTON. Mr. President, I ask a few minutes' time of the Senate to explain briefly the position I have occupied, and do now occupy, on the pending bill to repeal the purchasing clause of the Sherman law.

I have not participated in the debate on this bill—the ablest I ever heard—because I felt it was in better hands, and because I was unwilling to delay final action on the bill. I have attended punctually every session of the Senate to help make a quorum; sometimes when physical sufferings almost forbade it. I have discouraged filibustering in every form, and felt that final action should take place as soon as practicable.

Mr. President, I am a subscriber in good faith to the Chicago platform that demands this repeal and characterizes the law sought to be repealed as "a cowardly makeshift." The Democratic side of the Senate is in no sense responsible for this law. On its passage it received no vote from Democratic Senators. On its passage it received novote from Democratic Senators. It was a Republican measure, supported and passed by Republicans alone. It was signed by a Republican President. It was not only a "cowardly makeshift," but was passed to prevent the passage of a silver bill. This Sherman law is worse than a "cowardly makeshift." If not the cause of the panic through which the country has just passed, it has been a factor in bringing it about. It has certainly formed a pretext for the panic, which has destroyed more property rights in the United States than any dozen cyclones that have ever devasted this country. But more than this, it converted silver from a money metal to be an article of commerce, and in that way it has degraded one of the standard money metals of the Constitution. of the standard money metals of the Constitution.

It is not to be wondered that every Senator on this floor is in favor of the repeal of this most victous law. Even the distinguished Senator from Ohio, whose name is indelibly stamped upon the law as its author, now acknowledges that it is worse than a failure and is foremost among the advocates for its repeal.

I am and have been from the beginning in favor of repeal. But, Mr. President, I am equally a believer in the next succeeding clause of the Chicago platform, which declares for the remonetizing of silver. I am and always have been a firm believer in and an ardent supporter of bimetallism. I believe in silver as a money metal of the Constitution as firmly and as zealously as I do in gold. I believe no good financial system can be established on either one or the other of the two money metals of the Constitution.

The purchasing power of gold is already too great. Under the operations of the single gold standard the prices of the in-dustrial productions of the country have fallen so low that many will not pay the cost of production. Farming and planting interests, the great wealth-producing interests of the country, have languished till they are on the verge of ruin. It is to be greatly feared that unless there be a change in our financial system the farmers and planters, the finest portion of our population, will be utterly ruined.

Besides, we are warned here in burning words that the single gold standard will bring absolute ruin to several of our sister

No one could listen to the plaintive and eloquent appeals that have fallen from the Senators who represent what known as the silver States without the deepest and liveliest sympathy. I ask what Senator on this floor would have been less earnest in their efforts to protect his State if any single and important industry of his State was threatened with destruction by an act of Congres

These are some of the reasons epitomized that have led me to support the amendments that have been offered to this bill which have recognized silver as a money metal and remonetized silver, whether to a full or limited extent. I believed that the two declarations of the Chicago platform could be embodied in one bill as well if not better than in separate bills. Some one of these amendments may have gone a little too far, but I felt sure in voting for it that it would be carefully considered in felt sure in voting for it that it would be carefully considered in a committee of conference and result in some provision recognizing both gold and silver as money metals and to some extent remonetizing silver. I prefer a recognition of silver as a money metal, no matter to what extent, to a complete failure to make such recognition. If it gave too much silver or too little silver it could be easily corrected by future legislation. I am for a gound fine rotal system. sound financial system.

But, Mr. President, all the amendments that have been offered looking to silver as a money metal have been voted down. The that no such amendment shall be adopted.

The naked question remains, Shall the purchasing clause of the Sherman law remain as a blot on our financial system or shall we repeal it, and trust to future and separate legislation in favor of silver?

Many of the friends of unconditional repeal, including the dis-tinguished head of our Finance Committee, have assured us that the passage of this bill for unconditional repeal shall be followed by a bill for the remonetization of silver.

The President, our honored Democratic Chief Executive has assured us that he is in favor of a fair silver bill. Under these circumstances, Mr. President, I shall vote for the bill repealing unconditionally the purchasing clause of the Sherman law and stand ready to join our silver friends in a fight for silver, and shall strive earnestly and manfully for victory.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, before the final vote is taken,

I consider it my duty, coming as I do from an Eastern State, and standing alone from my section in the advocacy of what I consider honest money, the money of the people, to protest against the want of courage of this bill.

Through this long debate I have listened patiently, hoping that from some quarter or another we should hear the proposa of a measure broad enough to meet the difficulties before us, and to take the place of the suggestions which I ventured to offer more than a month ago. The hope has been disappointed. This side of the Senate has chosen to think its ideas of duty satisfied by throwing on the other side all the responsibility for the form of this legislation.

The other side has accepted and obeyed some impulse from without and has added nothing; suggested nothing of its own. Neither side has made a suggestion which, in my opinion, has been broad enough, and therefore I have studiously avoided voting for or against the amendments proposed. There can be but one solution; free coinage of the American product of silver is essential to our national prosperity.

I do not rise now to oppose longer the passage of the bill, which seems to be accepted as certain. On the other hand, I would arge the Senate to vote at once. Not to oppose or delay the bill, do I ask a moment of your attention, nor to irritate still further the temper which the struggle has already roused, but to make a last appeal on behalf of common patriotism. The Sento make a last appeal on behalf of common patriotism. The Senate can not with self-respect pass such a measure as this. We can not, by a naked order, without providing for the consequences, roverse a settled national policy and still retain a claim to be regarded as men of capacity, character, or courage.

The answer will, of course, be made that Congress must first decide the principle—the single issue—before dealing with its remoter consequences. The answer itself is a confession, an remoter consequences. The answer itself is a confession, an avowal of feebleness. Never in the history of our country has so serious an issue been met in a narrower and less liberal spirit. We can not separate the act from its consequences. We can not set an avalanche in motion without first providing for the safety of the people beneath it. We can not deliberately break the dam of a reservoir without first taking at least ordinary precautions to protect the villages in the valley below. We can not at least if we are men of common sense, or common honesty, we would not—declare a war without first providing either arms, men, or money.

We of the minority need not set ourselves up as prophet We know quite as well as any of the majority knows, that all forethought is subject to error, and that events rarely turn out as expected; but the question is not whether our forethought may be mistaken, it is whether Congress is or is not bound to think at all. The majority of this Chamber seems determined think at all. The majority of this chamber seems determined to act without thinking, for fear that if it stops to think it will not act. We on our side maintain that every public duty and interest bind us to measure the possible results of our acts, and that some of the possible results of this act leap into our very

Look for a moment at the arguments put forward in support of the repeal. One of the most forcible is that it would oblige of the repeal. One of the most forcible is that it would oblige Europe to enter into an agreement with us to return to the use of silver as money. That is to say, we intend to cut off our American market for silver in order to throw 50,000,000 ounces a year on the European market in addition to what we already send, in the hope of breaking down its market price. We expect, we intend, to break down the market for silver. Only this last week, too, we have been informed by telegraph that the government of India has requested the home Government to impose a duty on the import of silver into India, and that the home Government has refused until our action in this that the home Government has refused until our action in this Chamber should be decided. Whether this report is true or not matters nothing. In any case, the Indian government is known to be in serious difficulty in the attempt to raise the rate of the exchange and the value of its rupee; and a duty on silver suffcient to shut out silver bullion from India seems inevitable and immediate.

immediate.

Apparently, therefore, the two chief markets for silver are to be closed simultaneously within a few days. We are surely not unreasonable, then, if we infer that the value of silver, with reference to gold and money of all sorts resting on a gold basis, will materially fall. We may differ in opinion as to the extent of this fall, but the difference does not affect our duty as legislators. We are bound to consider the reasonable possibilities, and considers think it possible that the fall may be great. Should good judges think it possible that the fall may be great. it be great enough to cause distrust among the people of India, I believe many well-informed persons fear that the Indians may begin to throw their hoards on the market, which would make silver bullion unsalable.

All this may turn outquite differently. England may be converted; the present ministry may resign, and a new ministry may offer to adopt our silver policy, which this bill proposes to discard; war in Europe may change the conditions of the whole world; new mines or new processes may cheapen gold; but we are not gambling on such chances. We are bound only to provide against dangers, and only against dangers reasonably evident. The fall in the price of silver is a probability admitted by everyone inside or outside this Chamber. What security do we propose to offer in this bill, or in any legislation now before Congress against the consequences of such a fall?

One of these probable consequences is an increased demand for gold to take the place of silver. Already in Europe the governments are fighting for gold. France refuses to part with hers; the Imperial Bank of Germany keeps up a high rate of discount to attract gold; the Bank of England has recently annoyed the whole business community by keeping its rates of discount far whole business community by keeping its rates of discounting above the market rate in order to protect its gold reserve. India has for fifty years absorbed much gold. If silver is to be discredited, she may want more than ever. What, then, is to be our position if we pass this bill as it stands, without regarding probable consequences? We have liabilities in paper or silver, the value of which we are about to imperil, amounting to one thousand millions, and we have, as the foundation for all this credit, well about sighty millions of gold in the Treesung to sand millions, and we have, as the foundation for all this credit, only about eighty millions of gold in the Treasury.

This view is too favorable to the Treasury. As matter of fact, we have a deficit of several millions a month. The Treasury has thus far met this deficit by paying gold out of its reserve. No application has been made to us for resources; no application can now be made and met without some further delay. If we manage to keep fifty millions of gold in the Treasury we shall do well.

Every intelligent American knows that such a course is worse than error and approaches hard on crime. No hanker who found than error and approaches hard on crime. No banker who feared the penitentiary would knowingly and willingly let his liabilities stand in such a relation to his assets. If he did it by deliberately destroying the value of his chief asset, he would certainly have to pass the rest of his life in a prison or in an asylum. Ten to one is a gambler's chance. Twenty to one is the risk only of a lunatic. No banker who values his solvency allows his coin or convertible assets to fall below the scale of one to three, and on that scale our Treasury is bound to put not fifty millions, but three hundred and fifty million gold dollars into the vaults before this bill becomes law.

What shall be said, what can be said of financiers who de-liberately set to work to destroy the value of their assets and intend afterwards to borrow to the full extent of the value they have wantonly destroyed? If the Secretary of the Treasury, or the Committee on Finance of this Senate, had begun by a request for three hundred millions in gold, they would, at least, have shown that they knew what sort of a financial operation they were undertaking. If, after the passage of this bill and a further decline in the value of silver, they should ask for such a loan, the request will be fatal to their reputation as financiers. They have not asked for it; we can hardly thrust it upon them; this bill contains no suggestion of gold, and the Secretary is paying it out with a free hand. We are wasting our silver and our gold and our credit, and we call remonstrance factious.

The bill, then, does not propose to increase the gold reserve. Will it protect the eighty millions now in the Treasury? The Bank of France flatly refuses to pay out gold. The Bank of England raises its rate of discount indefinitely and contracts the circulation. Our Treasury can do neither. Anyone who can obtain a greenback can take gold, and the greenbacks alone amount to more than $300,000,000. If this bill should, as is reasonably probable, increase the demand for gold, the Treasury is exposed to the necessity of paying only in silver—of discharging one liability by another, which we are, by this act,

Since we are on the subject of possibilities, which we are bound to consider and for which, if they are reasonable, we are bound to provide before passing this bill, I will venture to suggest another. The new policy looks to a further fall in the value of silver bullion. Any fall, which causes much further decline, must render silver coin a very dangerous medium for the Government to use as money. With modern appliances, and with little capital, a skillful mechanic could coin a dollar identical with the Government dollar—perhaps not to be distinguished from it—in any quantity and with little risk of detection.

The temptation even now is great; perhaps the thing is already being done on a large scale without our knowing it. What would it be if the profit were still greater—say 80 cents on the dollar? If the time should come when coiners can make a clear profit of $80,000 out of every hundred thousand they manufacture, without danger, or loss, or injury to anyone except the Treasury, the conclusion is surely reasonable that we may be obliged to withdraw all our silver coin. If so, what shall we substitute? Shall it be gold? Would our people consent to buy eleven hundred millions of gold at a time when every other government would necessarily be obliged to do the same thing?

Evidently we should not resort to gold, but to paper. Am I wrong in saying that we all feel fear—and I, for one, feel not only fear, but certainty—that in such a situation we should be driven by political necessity into the use of irredeemable paper—fiat money? Is this result, which is or ought to be present in all our minds, provided for or even considered in this bill? Has the majority faced the possibility? Yet should this evidently possible case occur, every member of this Senate who votes for the bill as it stands will have to admit that he knowingly, deliberately, advisedly refused to provide against the danger which his own act brought on.

Again, this is a measure of contraction. Reversing our whole policy, it announces to the million and a half of new citizens who every year enter upon active life, that they must get along as best they can with the same amount of specie money which many, if not most, of their fathers already declare to be insufficient. Do we intend this new policy to be permanent? For myself, I solemnly protest that I have not the smallest idea what our intention may be. A bill like this, which upsets from top to bottom the whole of our old system, ought to explain and affirm the new one; but I study the bill and the debate in vain to discover what ultimate object the majority has in its mind. Finally, if gold should be made by this act scarcer than it is—if commodities should fall still further with reference to the gold

Finally, if gold should be made by this act scarcer than it is—if commodities should fall still further with reference to the gold standard—this bill may seriously affect your revenue laws. We all know that the best authorities estimate the fall in the price of commodities since 1873 at more than one-third. If gold should be forced up—if new panies are to be foreseen—if commodities are to be still further reduced on the gold standard, our whole revenue system must be reformed to meet the emergency. We can not touch the tariff until we know the effect of our silver legislation on prices.

If we do so now, we may merely have to undo, in the next session, what is done in this. The Senate will be not only justified, but will possibly be compelled, to take this risk into grave consideration, if not in passing this bill, then in acting on any introduced the research which may conserve the research.

future measure which may concern the revenue.

The majority does not choose to accept these views of reasonable possibilities, which ought to be embraced in this scheme. They have chosen to ignore these questions. After opposition to this bill had practically ceased, and its passage was regarded as assured, Senators were bound to answer reasonable criticism of the details of their scheme. Silence at this point ceased to be good policy or good polities. It was never a sign of statesmanship or of courage; it has now become a sign of something worse, something I will not characterize.

In the history of parliamentary government, as far as a general rule can ever be called established, it has been established that the party which resorts to silence as a weapon—which votes, but refuses to answer—is in the wrong. The question I am trying to ask is, not whether the majority is correct in its principles, for that seems to be settled in its favor as far as numbers go, but whether it has seriously faced its own act. If not, it is in the wrong, whatever the event may be.

it is in the wrong, whatever the event may be.

Already the action of Europe and European governments has spread ruin throughout the United States; has for six months paralyzed industry; has thrownour largest corporations into bank-ruptcy; has ruined several of our Western States, and through them has cost Eastern capitalists many millions of money invested in the West. We are going—certainly not in the gayety of our hearts, for of gayety I admit that the majority shows no trace—but, willingly or not, we are going to finish what Europe has successfully begun.

Those who have steadily and stubbornly opposed this policy may now fold their arms and wait. Henceforward the responsibility rests on the other side, and no doubt the majority will be held to it. If the party, or the combination of parties, or whatever the number of Congressmen and Senators and other individuals may be which makes up the combined responsibility for this measure—if they, or it, do not provide for dangers distinctly pointed out, or for any other dangers which they ought to have foreseen even if not expressly pointed out; if they refuse to widen their vision and listen to warning, the country will have to be the final judge between us. No great statesman in our history has ever effected any good object by such means.

Not in such a spirit or by such tactics did Hamilton organize the national finances or Gallatin direct them. Clay and Webster did not enlighten the Senate by methods like this, or by narrowing the field of their intellect. You may search long and far in the worst periods of our history to find a parallel for legislation so narrow in a crisis so yeat.

islation so narrow in a crisis so vast.

Finally, no Senator must reply by pleading that all these cestions can be settled by subsequent legislation. They can delayed. The difficulties keep step with the act. The Secan not afford to pass this bill in its present shape, and then adjourn, leaving further legislation to take its chance among the difficult and violently disputed questions that will crowd on us in the regular session. The influence, whatever it is, which is responsible for the present bill certainly does not command the confidence of a majority of the Senate.

Even though we had been directed by the genius of the greatest statesmen the world ever saw, we should still need—and, in that case, we should certainly have—not only the guaranty of further legislation, but also the legislation itself. Directly and personally we are ourselves responsible for its absence. If we fail now of our duty, we have no ground for confidence that the duty will ever be performed. On the Republican side of this Chamber, if not on the other, we have thus far seen nothing to create confidence of any sort in the wisdom, the unanimity, or the courage of the party—if it is a party—which controls, or is supposed to control, the Government.

In the hope, therefore, of inducing the majority to deal with the subject in a broader spirit, and with the intention, if that hope fails, of at least completing the record and of leaving no excuse in future for the supporters of this bill to plead that the whole subject was not offered for their consideration, I may ask the Senate to vote on the propositions which I have already offered in debate, or I would prefer that this bill be referred to a select committee of seven or more members, with instructions to report on the further measures which may be required to provide for carrying safely into effect the object of the legislation as proposed some time since by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. Morgan].

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I have come to the Senate today, contrary to the advice of my physician, for the purpose of expressing in the final stages of this bill some opinions which I have formed about it after the best deliberation I have been able to bestow upon the subject.

The situation with which we are confronted in the Senate today seems to me to be a very lamentable one, one of which I can speak only with pain, and which I can contemplate only with serious apprehensions for the future welfare of our country.

I do not claim, Mr. President, higher patriotism than any other gentleman on this floor who differs with me or agrees with me in sentiment; nor do I claim greater wisdom or greater experience than any, even the most humble and unpretending of the members of this body; but I have my convictions upon this subject, particularly as to what is best and wisest and safest to be done for the constituency I represent here; and I desire to give expression to some of those convictions on this occasion. I trust in doing so that I shall not be considered as trying to procrastinate even for a moment the final calamity, as I consider it, which is about to fall upon the country in the passage of the pending bill.

The people of the country are prepared for almost anything. They have been worried, and provoked, and depressed, and kicked, and cuffed about by the monetary power in this land in such a way as that they find at last that their dependence upon it is such that their material and smallest domestic interests are controlled entirely by the power of those who occupy the high places in the land, and who have been placed in that ascendency simply by Congressional legislation.

The people of the United States are not born some princes and some subjects; they are born equals, and they are supposed to have equal rights in all of the beneficent heritage we derived from the wisdom of our fathers, than whom no fathers were wiser or better. They were born to the equal enjoyment of all these privileges, and when the country was first launched upon the experimental idea of self-governing sovereign power residing in the people and in the States there was but very little of that apparent disparity which now exists between the classes of society in this country. There were not many colossal fortunes existing in the land; there were some which by way of comparison were very large, but they were not colossal in the sense that they are now, and they had not been derived through speculation and poculation, and the handling of the powers of the Government of the United States to the disadvantage of their neighbors and to their own aggrandizement, but they had been built up by the sober and earnest labors of honest men devoted to honest pursuits in an honest way.

We have passed that era and have come into an era in which the most extravagant conceptions and wishes of the human mind in respect of the aggrandizement of wealth have been realized; and we find ourselves beset now by classes in the United States who seem to demand for themselves the power to control everyone else in all his industrial labors, opportunities, and hopes in respect of everything that concerns human existence. This class in the United States owes its origin, owes its present existence, owes its present power and its future prospects entirely to the legislation of Congress. The States have not done this; the people have not done it; it has been the outgrowth of legislation, which might sometimes be characterized as being corrupt, oftentimes corrupt, and certainly in the line of that human endeavor which always grasps power whenever it is brought within the reach of the mortal hand.

This is the situation with which we are confronted to-day, and the labors of this body for the last ninety days have been devoted to an investigation of the measures, on the one side for relief from this situation, and on the other side, for the increase of the powers of this class of people. The line is a broad and distinct one. There is no human being who is capable of reasoning, who has the responsibilities of manhood in this great republic of ours, who does not recognize the fact that the party divisions or the actual divisions, whether partisan or not, which exist amongst the people of the United States, all exist upon this line, one class standing on one side of it and the other class standing on the other side.

The class who claim Congressional power for the purposes of personal aggrandizement and increase of wealth is in a vast minority when considered numerically. The class against whom the levies and assessments and contributions to be voted to this minority class are demanded, form a vast unorganized mass of industrial people, engaged in a great variety of pursuits, chiefly agricultural, who by reason of their situation are incapable of perfect organization, and are therefore not capable of resisting the movements which are made by this minority class against their interests and against their rights. The feeling of brother-hood and benevolence which characterized the people of the hood and benevolence which characterized the people of the United States in the earlier days of the republic has departed, and it is now the purpose, it seems, of Congressional legislation that the one class shall make out of the other class all that they can realize, everything that can be done through the powers of taxation, the powers of discrimination, and whatever powers can be exercised in a legislative sense by the Congress of the United

Well, perhaps unfortunately for me personally, I am thrown with this majority class; my sympathies are with this vast mass of people; my heart is with them; my convictions that they are entitled to the protection of every feature of the Constitution of the United States are keen and sensitive; and therefore, Mr. President I am ready to defend they recently to the best of President, I am ready to defend them according to the best of my ability whenever and wherever I can.

This long debate has reached its final stage and seems to have included almost every phase of financial inquiry, and our opinions, expressed in our votes, are ready to be placed upon the Journal of the Senate.

In the earlier stages of the debate, after this bill had come over from the other House, I was deeply impressed with the con-viction that the immense sweep of the questions involved in our mixed, incongruous, and dislocated financial system would lead us into world-wide fields of discussion; not without profit, but without any practical and permanent results for the relief of the country. I attempted to relieve this situation and only succeeded in causing some severe opposition and even severer criticeeded in causing some severe opposition and even severer criticism of myself personally.

These fears have been fully realized in so far as any vote we are to give on this measure is concerned. There is nothing in this bill except the death warrant of silver as a money metal, and only its final execution will follow. A fatal blow to silver was delivered in the first Sherman bill of 1873, and lingering it has lived, until now it is doomed to sudden death by the third Sherman bill, which amends, reënacts, and adopts the second Sherman bill of 1890, and it is masquerading as a Democratic measure. Instead of curing the finances we seem to have caught a new disease, and a loathsome one, if our platform is true. I confess that this last sad phase of legislative hostility to silver as a money metal, sustained by a minority of Democrats and a mamoney metal, sustained by a minority of Democrats and a majority of Republicans in the Senate, has nearly cast out hope for the relief of the industrial classes, and has filled me with sorrow

To my understanding, it is the complete overthrow of Democratic principles and pledges, and is an irrevocable surrender of the whole attitude of the Democratic party to the demands of a tyrannical, corrupt, insolent, and overbearing combination of those corporations and men who measure out money to the peo-ple at will for the sole purpose of increasing their gains by the alternate expansion and contraction of the currency.

The first Sherman law of 1873, which destroyed silver as legal-tender money and deprived it of coinage into standard dollars, failed to encounter the veto of President Grant only because he did not discover the fine artifice employed in the demonetization of that metal. Whether or not its passage through Congress was stealthy, it certainly escaped the knowledge of Gen. Grant, Had he known what was being done there is no doubt that his veto would have arrested it.

True, the hope of resurrection is vaguely held out to the silver men, but we prefer not to die in order to test the resurrec-tionary powers of the Senator from Indiana. The doctor who presided at the deathbed of Lazarus was not expected to do much towards his resurrection. Besides, the Senator from Ohio will not consent that Lazarus shall come forth; nor is it certain that his resurrection will not be vetoed by the President.

But there is no need to resort to illustration. It is intended by this bill to destroy silver in order to make room for paper currency based on gold, and, to support that currency, the peo-ple are to be taxed to provide gold by the sale of bonds to foron Saturday the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Sherman] informed us that, in his opinion, this measure will not meet the exigency of the financial situation.

I will read from the RECORD what the Senator said:

I will read from the RECORD what the Senator said:

Mr. Sherman. Now, Mr. President, the passage of some such provision is undoubtedly necessary, and I trust that the Senators on the other side of the Chamber who have the control necessarily, who have the majority, will make some such provision as this. I feel at liberty to call their attention to the subject, because I consider it vital. I fear very much that after a little while, as to the results of the measure that we are about to accomplish, the suspension of the purchasing clause of the act of 1830, the people will find out that it has not been the germ and root of the evil under which they are suffering, and they will look to us for having provided an inefficient measure, a measure that will not meet the exigency.

After three mouths of debate, in which this Senate Chamber

After three months of debate, in which this Senate Chamber has resounded from day to day with the declaration that the purchasing clause of the Sherman act was the cause of the collapse and the paralysis in the financial condition of the people of the United States, the honorable Senator from Ohio rises in his place and contradicts the whole of it, and disproves the whole of it by his statement which shows that we have been following a phantasmagoria; that we have been following a false pretense, which has been set up by the monetary and financial establishments of this country in order to alarm the people into distrust and servitude.

I fear very much that after a little while, as to the results of the measure that we are about to accomplish, the suspension of the purchasing clause of the act of 1800—

He calls that a suspension which is an absolute repealthe suspension of the purchasing clause of the act of 1890, people will find out that it has not been the germ and root of the evil under which they are suffering, and they will look to us for having provided an inefficient measure, a measure that will not meet the exigency.

If that was not the germ and root of the evil under which we are suffering, let some Senator rise here and point out what was. There you have reversed the public judgment; there you have taken the bandage off of the public eyes that have been so long in darkness and trepidation, and you have disclosed to the peo-ple of the country the fact that they have been in error in their frantic desire to get away from the purchasing clause of the Sherman law.

What, then, has caused the trouble? What has been the germ and root of this evil, the root of bitterness we are trying to extract from the public situation in order that relief may come to our afflicted country? It is nowhere else, Mr. President, noour afflicted country? It is nowhere else, Mr. President, nowhere else than in this false clamor gotten up by the banking institutions in the United States and in England and in Germany for the purpose of alarming the people until they could repeal the one law for the purchase of silver by the United States which the Senator from Ohio says has not been the cause of the evil.

Here we have, Mr. President, the third lesson of the programme. The first is the final demonetization of the silver that is not already owned by the Government or in circulation, the silver that lies in the rocks and the mountains of the West.

The second is the increase of the power of the national banks to issue their notes to the amount of 10 per cent on the bonds that they may hold. That has already been brought forward. It was debated in the Senate and was abandoned for a reason that I never understood until I had the opportunity to read the RECORD of Saturday's proceedings.

I now see it as plain as light. They knew they could not pass it then, but they know now that after this bill passes they can pass it. They know that the weight and power given to the attitude of the national banks by the passage of this bill on their false demand will place them in such a high position of authority amongst the people of the United States as that the Senator from Indiana will have nothing else to do but to move his bill, which he has had already partially debated, to add 10 per cent to the issues of the national banks, and have the people pay the interest upon that in order that they may have money to buy their bread and meat.

The third stage is the sale of gold bonds to the sum of $200,000,000 to fortify the Treasury against gold raiders. This last proposition called out the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], and he poured a flood of light on several matters that have given the country much concern and alarm recently. I will notice two or three of these matters:

First, the Sanator shows that this bill to not what is described.

First, the Senator shows that this bill is not what is demanded by the Chicago Democratic platform. Second, that it is the fruit of a coalition and was dictated to the Senate by the Senator from Ohio. It is in fact the third Sherman bill.

Third, that the consideration of the bill has been delayed by the friends of the bill, and not by its enemies; and Fourth, that the Republicans in the Senate broke up the compromise to which all the Democrats had agreed except five, I believe, and which was understood at the time to be agreeable to

will read from the RECORD what the Senator from Maryland I will read from the RECORD what the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] said in his debate with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] on these points, and I will read literally, Mr. President, because this debate between those Senators is to be immortal. This debate is the key that unlocks the situation. This debate is the last revelation which we have received from an honest, a candid, and a manly source of the sincere truth of the situation, and I thank him; I bow my thanks to the Senator from Maryland that he has had the manhood to come out before the world and to state in the debate with the Senator from Ohio evently what is the situation to day in the Senator for Ohio exactly what is the situation to-day in the Senate of the United States upon this very important, yes, this vital measure. The Senator from Maryland said:

Mr. President, I have not detained the Senate many moments in the discussion of the pending question. I have studiously refrained from doing so. But I can not help observing the very remarkable attitude of the distinguished Senator from Ohio, who is the acknowledged leader on the other side of this Chamber, and of more than half the Senators who support the bill for the repeal of the purchasing clause of the so-called Sherman law.

The army corps of the Senator from Ohio is the largest one that is attacking it.

His anxiety for its repeal, his support of its repeal, is perfectly well understood; but at the same time that distinguished Senator has well known the fact that the passage of the pending bill was impossible at any time except as a nonpartisan measure, except by the support of the twenty-five or twenty-five in the other side of the Chamber and the twenty-one or twenty-two Democrats on this.

Its only hope of success from the beginning until now has been unity of action between gentlemen who have such diverse views upon general political questions, and not to bring in the mere party question and attempt to take party advantage of the delays, of the mistakes, if there have been mistakes; and now, in the closing hours of the struggle, which will go down in listory as one of the most remarkable that has ever taken place in this Chamber, that distinguished leader tells us and tells the country that the measure itself will be impotent, that it eliminates silver or the further use of it for the present.

Mr. Sherraman. If did not say a word to that effect. On the contrary, I spoke strongly in favor of silver to its largest extent, so that it would not demonstize gold.

Mr. GORMAN. If I have misunderstood the Senator, all around me here tize gold. Mr. Gorman. If I have misunderstood the Senator, all around me here sem to have shared with me in misunderstanding him. He has said that the passage of the bill as it stands will not give the relief to the country that the country has expected.

Mr. Sherman. I said it might not meet the expectations of the people.

Mr. Gorman. If his argument was understood at all on this side of the Chamber, he said that when the bill is passed the Treasury will not be in a condition to meet the wants of the country, or to keep the finances in a healthy condition; and the only relief suggested by the Senator is to issue bonds, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to use them not only for the purpose of maintaining the parity between the two metals, but for the ordinary expenditures of the Government.

Mr. Sherman. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GORMAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GORMAN. How does he propose to pay the deficiency in the revenues of $60,000,00, reported by the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. GORMAN. I will come to that, if the Senator will pardon me a moment. Now, Mr. President, if I understood the position of the Democratic party in the beginning of this controversy, it was that we pledged ourselves to the repeal of the Sherman law.

That was the pledge of the Democratic platform at Chicago.

That was the pledge of the Democratic platform at Chicago. That was the pledge to which I have always responded; it is a pledge that I am willing to enact by my vote to-day, the repeal of the Sherman law.

of the Sherman law.

Mr. BUTLER. A part of it?

Mr. GORMAN. No, sir; the whole law. Our platform demanded it.

Every newspaper that has breathed a Democratic breath at first demanded that Congress should carry out the decree of the party. I take it that other Senators like myself were questioned by the great metropolitan press as to whether we were in favor of the absolute repeal of that law, the whole law, without conditions. When that was being strongly urged I do not think I am mistaken when I say that the distinguished Senator from Ohlo, in a speech or an interview in his own State, denounced the repeal of the entire Sherman law, and stated that he would favor the repeal of the purchasing clause alone.

There broke the light in upon this majority that we have on this side of the Chamber, when the Senator from Ohio in his own State announced that he would not vote for the repeal of the entire Sherman law, but would vote for the repeal of the purchasing clause alone. Then a new and sudden light sprung upon the Democrats upon this side of the Chamber who follow that Senator, and they embraced it with religious fervor. The Senator from Maryland continues:

Senator from Maryland continues:

I am not mistaken in that. If I am, I ask the Senator to correct me. The Senator says that now?

Mr. German. I believe that is what the bill professes to do.

Mr. German. Yes; that is what the bill professes. I am coming to that. The President of the United States, anxious and earnest in his desire for its repeal, was too astute and learned a statesman not to know that he had not the power in his own party or with his own party to repeal any portion of that law, because the division is so sharp and great among both parties that neither party would have the power to deal with this question and make the repeal, and we were compelled to take the terms offered by the Senator from Ohio.

We were compelled to take the terms offered by the Senator from Ohio.

He held the key of the position. You have dictated the terms to us. It was the only thing we could get you to agree to for the relief of the country.

This falling out amongst these friends, all of whom went outside of the Democratic party to make their coalition, seems to have been sudden and serious. For a time it was a divorce a mensa et thoro. Now it appears that it is to be a divorce a vinculo matrimonii. It is a pity that such lovers should so early come to grief.

You have dictated the terms to us.

That may be said of the coalition; but I, as a Democrat, thank Almighty God that the Senator from Ohio has never had the power to dictate terms to me. He may dictate them to the President, to the Committee on Finance, to the Democracy on this side who follow his lead; but he can not dictate terms to

Then, Mr. President, when Congress met, we came here with forty-four Senators on this side of the Chamber, elected as Democrats, only one-half of this body, with the perfect knowledge on the part of every intelligent man in the Union that the party was hopelessly divided upon this question, as your party is also hopelessly divided. It may be said with truth that a large majority of the Democrats were at the beginning of the session against the repeal even of the purchasing clause of the Sherman act.

That seems to have been ascertained here. I was not here to know how the situation was; but it seems to have been ascertained by the wiseacres who lead these respective parties in their legislation in this Chamber and elsewhere that a majority of the Senate was against the repeal of the entire Sherman act without a substitute, and they were against the repeal even of the purchasing clause.

Mr. Buyler. Unconditional.
Mr. Gorman. The unconditional repeal. It was known that you had from thirteen to fifteen Republicans opposed to repeal. It was believed, and I think it was a fact easily made perfectly plain to everybody, that a clear majority of all the Senators elected were not in favor of the unconditional repeal, but they wanted some modification.

So the President and the Senator from Ohio, when this pet scheme was opened before the Senate of the United States, knew that they did not have a majority of either party here for its repeal, or a majority of both parties.

Complaints have been made of delay in this matter. I am glad of the opportunity to say, and I say it in justice to those who have fought this bill, that those of us who intended to vote for its final passage believed that we were in the minority, and a delay of weeks became necessary that we might convert enough to our side to pass the bill.

During this delay of weeks that occurred, because the friends of this bill knew that they could not pass it through this body, while opportunity was thus afforded for whatever of assistance could be given to it, the whole of the metropolitan press of the United States and the little resounding creatures that eatch their words and their inspirations from these greater sources roared out their indignation against what they were pleased to call the minority in the Senate, which according to the Senator from Maryland was then the majority, because they would not pass the bill. Anathemas have been heaped upon us until if they could be believed by the Almighty he would consign us to eternal perdition for what we have been doing here, when the fact was that the delay that was being occasioned in the Senate was because the promoters of the pending bill knew they could not pass it and were gambling for time.

Now, I thank God again that the light of truth has come to life. We stand here to-day vindicated before the American people, as men who have been badgered, put upon, imposed upon in the most outrageous and scandalous manner on this floor and elsewhere, because when they found at last, or supposed they found, they had a majority for passing the bill, they could not get us instantly to shut our mouths and come up and vote for our own execution. Says the Senator from Maryland:

The fact of it was that we were not ready for its consideration. As time went on the debate became sharp. And, Mr. President, I want to remark right here that it has been a great debate. The annals of Congress will not show one equal to it, and those who participated in it will go down to posterity as men who were equal to any who have preceded them.

He is mistaken about that. There will be a greater debate than that before the people when this bill gets out before them, and the people will be the debaters. They will debate it at the ballot box, and when their oratory comes to be heard it will resound throughout this Union and down through all the tides of

When the contest became sharp the doubt was then expressed as to the ower of the Senate to pass it, not as to the power to reach a vote, but the ower to pass unconditional repeal with a majority.

The doubt was not about reaching a vote, but it was about passing the bill unconditionally by a majority of this body.

In the very midst of the fight, in the hottest of it, when men were anxious, when every Senator was desirous that something might be done (and when I say every Senator I mean all on both sides of the Chamber) to relieve the great distress in the financial interests and in commercial affairs, the first note of warning that we had, publicly uttered, came from the Senator from Ohio, the Senator who led more than one-half of the repeal column, thatit was impossible to pass it. Here is his interview, published October 5, 1893, in a telegram to the Cincinnati Enquirer dated Washington, October 4:

"[Cincinnati Enquirer, October 5, 1893.]

"WASHINGTON, D. C., October 4.

"I called on Senator Sherman to-night. More than any other quantity in the Senate he represents his party. I asked him bluntly if he believed the law which bore his name would be repealed?
"His answer was frank—direct:
"I do not,' said he.

That was October 4.

That was October 4.

"Then," said I, "what next?"

"I can not," said he, "be explicit as to what next. The position of the Republican members of the Senate is now passive. The Democrats are endeavoring to arrange a compromise. If they succeed, they can pass a compromise measure no matter if the Republican Senators are solidly arrayed against it. Our side, or rather the large majority of our side, stand ready to vote for unconditional repeal whenever the Democrats fix the time to vote. We are even ready to support a closure."

"Have you any idea," I asked, "of the terms of compromise?"

"No," said the Senator, "I am not in the secrets of those arranging it. There have been several propositions involving the issue of bonds and the reduction of the monthly purchases of silver. My judgment is, and it is, however, a judgment, that in the end the Democrats will unite on a proposition to extend the provisions of the Sherman law three years, with a reduction of the monthly purchases of silver to 2,500,000 ounces of silver instead of 4,500,000 ounces as now."

"Do you think the President would sign such a bill?"

compromise. It en down.

Now, then, if the compromise was made and it was a fair one and a just one and one to reconcile conflicting interests, it would tend in every respect, if it had any tendency or any e fect whatever, to relieve the country. If the President has refused to sign it, in the opinion of the Senator from Ohio, he breaks his party down, destroys his prestige. There is no blessing to fall upon the venerable head of the Senator from Ohio which I dare say would be so delightful to him as the consummation of that very well-arranged plan to put the President a second time in controversy with his friends in this body. Political manipulation for the sake of party success has become in the United States of America the substitute for every honorable and elevated senti-ment of statesmanship, and all of our destiny is measured to-day, it seems to me, entirely by the question what effect it will have upon the party. The Senator from Ohio said:

I think the reporter has been rather more accurate than usual in that in

Here is confirmation:

I think that was the substance of what I said. I desire merely to add only that I believe the bill would not have passed but for the abortive attempt to compromise, which, falling through, left nothing else to do but to pass it. However that is a mere matter of interview between ourselves.

That is a strange condition; that because a proposition was made to compromise and it was agreed to, and untimately it fell through, it was the reason why this bill should pass. So it seems to me it makes no difference to us what we do or in what direction we tend, whatever we do is to be visited upon us as a judgment inflicted. If we agree to a compromise, that is regarded as a surrender. If the compromise is broken up the bill must be passed, because, not that we did not agree to the compromise but ecause it could not be carried into execution, the President being unwilling to execute it.

Says the Senator from Maryland-is the date of this interview. The Senator from Ohio knew perfectly well, as every other man in the country knew, that he was laying down a condition for the Democratic party to unite.

He laying down a condition for the Democratic party to unite! What is the Democratic party worth to itself, to the country, or to posterity when the Senator from Ohio has the key to its situation and can lay down conditions to it? What is your majority worth here in thus trifling with the people, thus deceived, thus overrun, and finally handed over to the tender mercies of the Senator from Ohio.

And we are told that-

He knev

That is, the Senator from Ohio knew-

That is, the Senator from Ohio knew—

He knew to unite was as impossible as it was to fly, unless it meant the extension of the purchase of silver to some future period. He knew that the demand in the country for its unconditional repeal coming to us through the press and trade organizations in every section were such that the entire-enate was most anxious to do something to relieve anxiety. He knew another thing, that with the difference of views upon this financial question between the East and the West and the North and the South it was impossible to pass what we call in the Eastern States a sound financial bill with bonds unless we had his coöperation and the coöperation of those on the other side who thought with us; and when you placed the conditions upon the Democratic party, as you had the power to do, holding the key of the situation with your 25 or 23 votes, you forced us into a position to take a measure that would not be satisfactory to the people for whom the Senator from Ohio speaks and whom I have the honor to represent in part on this floor.

But, Mr. President, there was an earnest desire, there has been from the Eginning of the session an earnest desire, there has been from the fining of the session as earnest desire, there has been from the fining of the session as earnest desire on this side of the Chamber, to frame such legislation as might redound to the interest of all the people of this country. Sharp as the division was upon the particular measures, there is not a Democrat upon this side of the Chamber who was not impressed with a desire to harmonize the party, to sustain the Democratic Administration.

Bold words, yet true and full of comfort and consolation, because they are manly and because they are true; and I trust that they may disabuse in the mind of the President of the United States the injustice which is being done to many a sound Democrat far older in the party than he is, with the idea, doubtless, often suggested to him, that his best friends are traitors to him and to the Democracy. If he wishes to do so now, after this declaration, coming from an eminent man who has all the time suggested to him, that he has all the second to the second the second that the relieved receiving the number of the Shermann states of the Shermann state tained this policy of repealing the purchasing clause of the Sherman act, let him remain in darkness and help himself.

man act, let him remain in darkness and nelp himself.

All were willing to make sacrifices of opinion and to set aside the convictions of a lifetime and unite in doing something which would relieve the business distress, and save their Administration from defeat. They tried to get together. They tried to do what was right. There were many of them who snared the conviction that it is extraordinary, unusual, and unfortunate to strike down summarily, without an hour's warning, any great interest that we had built up or made possible by laws, no matter how vicious and bad the laws themselves. Their deliberations could have been carried to a consummation with the bones that the Senator from Ohio speaks of

Yes, sir; it could have been done. There is not a man on this floor or anywhere else in the United States who deprecates more sincerely than I do the further taxation of the people of the United States to sustain the reserve of gold in the Treasury, which I always considered to be a useless and needless thing in a country like ours. There are none who would go further than I would to prevent an increase of taxation for this purpose. But Mr. President, I would do it only for the sake of peace and harmony, not amongst the Democrats alone, but amongst the people of the different sections of this country, for that sort of peace and harmony and quietude and deliberation of action and caution in progress of legislative expedient and provision which would save to five or six States in the West the millions of money that they have invested on our invitation in the opening up of the silver mines of that country—not merely under our invitation, but under bounties and beneficencies that we have extended as an inducement to them to stake the whole battle of life upon their success in the opening up of silver mines for the benefit of the people and the Treusury of the United

Not for the benefit of the makers of trinkets and ornaments, but for the benefit of the substantial foundation of the great circulating medium and the debt-resolving and debt-paying power of silver money in the country, that should underlie, along with gold, the eternal union of the whole structure of our financial system as it has done since this Government was a government, and long before, while these colonies existed, and long before, during the ages and cycles of time where civilization has been found to have addressed itself in its growth and in its prosperity the big strong foundation as its arread standard support.

found to have addressed itself in its growth and in its prosperity to this strong foundation as its sure and steadfast support.

I should have voted, Mr. President, even to tax the people; I should have gone to a constituency who would have blamed me at first most seriously for having done a thing of that kind; but, appealing to their reason and their judgment, I should have said to them: "You have made many sacrifices and you have done it in a manly way, and the reward has come to you in the end in an abundance of progress, which perhaps you had not yourselves contemplated; and now, rather than to tear the structure down rudely, rather than to yield summarily to the removal of silver from the basis of its powers as a debt-paying money, I preferred further to tax you; I did not wish to do it, but I had it to do in order to ease the situation until the people at the ballot box could get control of this Government and have the power to pass their final decree that there was to be no more of this kind of legislation."

I signed that paper, and I did it, Mr. President, under these views, and indorsed every word and syllable in it—I mean that part of it—but I signed it in order to have peace and fraternity in the Democratic party. Now, when it is broken up by the refusal of the Senator from Ohio to accept it, while it does not accord with his views of the policy which he has been commissioned by somebody to dictate to the Democratic party as wise, it passes out of existence, and the next and only resource, we are told, is to vote for the bill, commit suicide because you can not get a chance to live on fair terms with your friends and neighbors. That is the proposition.

sioned by somebody to dictate to the Democratic party as wise, ft passes out of existence, and the next. and only resource, we are told, is to vote for the bill, commit suicide because you can not get a chance to live on fair terms with your friends and neighbors. That is the proposition.

I am very glad, Mr. President, that this matter has come to light. I feel greatly relieved personally, and I know my colleagues here—the majority of the Democrats on this side of the Chamber—who are opposed to this bill all feel relieved that they are no longer to occupy the category of disruptionists and obstructionists: that they are no longer to be classed as men who are fit only for being gagged and choked and bound hand and foot and made to sit in silence while other men conduct the affairs of the Government.

I feel gratified that the truth has come to light, and that our vindication did not depend and does not depend upon posterity or upon history or upon asseveration or disclaimer upon our part; but it comes from the mouth of an eminent Senator, who has been all the time amoning our views on this question.

has been all the time opposing our views on this question.

From 1873 to this the supporters of this cruel law have been in the minority, and the people have condemned it at every election when the question has been raised. But only on one occasion have they had the power in Congress to overcome a Presidential veto with a two-thirds vote. To do that they were forced to make the compromise of the Bland bill. The Presidential veto has always stood ready as a reserve corps to shield this law of 1873, and the will of the people has thus been thwarted. Why both the great political parties, as they have come successively into power, have been forced to lend the veto power to the protection of the first Sherman law is a matter that is not in the least obscure to the campaign executive committees of both parties. It is a simple story, but a very sad one, which runs thus: they could not, when successful, refuse to protect the interests of the moneyed classes who furnished the means to conduct the political campaigns.

Now, I do not wish to be misunderstood as to this statement.

I do not mean that the candidates for the Presidency, on either side, are pledged in advance to the use of the veto power, or any other power, for the doing of anything that is not promised in the platform of the party.

I mean that they have no moral power to refuse the demands made upon them when they are reconcilable to their personal opinions, no matter how far they may disappoint the will of the people expressed in the ballot box. They find excuses for refusing to obey the will of the people.

We have had one example of this moral coersion which this country can never forget. I allude to the counting in of Mr. Hayes as President, when Mr. Tilden was elected. Mr. Hayes had no power to resist the flat of his party managers and would have been disgraced, as a traitorous poltroon, if he had declined to accept the office after his party had thrust him into it, even if he had been conscious, as millions of people believed was the fact, that he was not elected to the Presidency.

There is in the United States a distinct political class, known as the managers of Presidential campaigns, who exercise unwonted powers in the control of executive and legislative measures.

They are consulted first, if not exclusively, by their respective parties, upon every great public question. In effect they too frequently hold and control the veto power. They are "the power behind the throne, greater than the throne itself," and while they are irresponsible to the people they rule largely in their affairs.

This class of politicians must needs be very close to the moneyed classes and corporations from whom they obtain the sinews of war, and can not take sides with the people against those classes. This is a terrible and growing evil. All of these party dictators, on both sides, have fenced in the Sherman law of 1873 with barriers that the people have not been able to surmount.

While their sway continues, the people will get no relief as to the use of silver as a money metal. No President since Gen. Grant has had the power to withstand them. He would never have consented to the destruction of silver as a money metal, if he had known or suspected that it was slain in the Sherman law of 1873, or in the Revised Statutes. When this bill has become a law, I can not now see any remedy for the people save in the election of a President who is friendly to silver as a part of the American system of finance.

After the effect of the Sherman law of 1873 was known, and its operation had filled the land with tramping wanderers in search of work, to earn or beg their bread, the Democratic party, in obedience to its traditional duty, took up the cause of the suffering multitudes, and with earnest promises won their votes to its standards.

This is the cause, Mr. President, of the strength of the Democratic party to-day. After five years of effort they had gained enough power to pass the Stanley Matthews resolutions for the restoration of silver and the Bland-Allison act for the purchase and coinage of silver dollars, and to re-stablish its debt-paying power. The people voted this relief to themselves, and their representatives in Congress were only prevented from granting it as fully as it had existed from the foundation of the Government until 1873 by the threatened use of the veto power. That power of a minority, used by a President who acted in harmony with them, was the barrier to the full exercise of the will of the people in the remonetization and free coinage of silver.

was the barrier to the full exercise of the will of the people in the remonetization and free coinage of silver.

The minority thus triumphed over the people and sustained their oppressors, and perpetuated their power to fill all the marts of commerce with bankruptcies and all the homes of industry with idleness and want.

The partial relief gained by the people through a compromise with the money power in the Bland-Allison bill was secured by a two-thirds vote of each House over the veto of President Hayes. If he had been backed by a subservient party even that relief would have been refused. The people moved onward after that for the completion of the great reformation for fifteen years, and again struck for the free coinage of silver on equal terms with gold. Again the veto power was invoked by the minority, and its threatened exercise was potent to defeat their will.

The controversy resulted in another Sherman law of 1890, which was also a compromise. In each of these compromises the people gained ground to the front, and would have triumphed over their oppressors but for the power in the grasp of the minority which was found in the control of the veto power. The bankers and stock gamblers, and the trust munipulators and the men who lurk in ambush to force the markets into corners, after a third trial, had fully ascertained the advantage they had in the control of the veto power.

Knowing that the people were aroused and would demand their rights, these conspirators, as an advance movement in the campaign of 1892, set about to capture the centrol of the veto power, no matter which of the great leading political parties should elect the President. They directed their supreme efforts to the nomination of candidates for the Presidency by each party who they knew would use the veto power, when needed, to prevent the restoration of silver as a full money metal equally with gold. They succeeded, and, in doing this evil, they inflicted upon the people a wrong as novel as it was stupendous, and by means that threaten the utmost danger to the Republic.

Money, which is their power, their only power, was used in enormous sums to control the two national conventions as to their membership and the nominations. How much was used, no self-respecting American is willing, it seems, to inquire. The subject is forbidding. There are men who know these facts, but there are none who are willing to disclose them. The result was that the control of the veto power, as a reserved force to check silver legislation, was secured to the minority on these questions of finance, whether the Democrats or the Republicans should elect their nominees.

They had no bargain or understanding to this effect; they did not need this; but they nominated men for the Presidency who were committed in public and official utterances to the sternest opposition to a return to the free coinage of silver, and whose recorded opinions would be their platform. Then in the ne-tional conventions they took care that in the pledges made to the people there should be a great show of friendship for silver, resounding promises, glittering generalities, and deceptive flatteries, which could be complied with as the parity fraud in the second Sherman law is complied with, by a total subversion of the plain intent of the law.

It was a sight to inspire mirth among the dead tenants of the catacombs to see two Presidential candidates striving to grasp the scepter of the veto power that they might wield it for the destruction of silver money, and yet professing to be the friends of bimetallism. They led opposing and belligerent forces in a joint campaign against silver. In those candidates and in those platforms the coalition began which is now being consummated in Congress, for the defeat of the will of the people expressed in every Democratic victory, at least since that party began to have a history.

The coalition assumes, with good reason, that it is in a numerical majority in the Senate. A majority of whom, I would inquire? Does one Senator in Georgia, one in North Carolina, one in Virginia, one in Kentucky, one in Texas, one in Oregon claim with any show of reason that he represents the majority of the people in each of these States, as against his colleague, when he votes for the destruction of silver as a money metal?

when he votes for the destruction of silver as a money metal?

The doctrine of the Constitution is that within its limitations the majority of the people rules. The doctrine of the coalition is that the numerical majority of Senators present in the Chamber rules absolutely, though the people may have instructed them in the elections, never so plainly, that they are violating the expressed will of a majority of the people. In a parliamentary sense this is true; but is it honest to vote down the expressed will of the people in the Senate unless it is done to check the dangerous execution of the popular will until wiser counsels can prevail?

When the wishes of the voting population in the United States are expressed, it is my belief that the ancient doctrine of the Democratic party, that gold and silver shall have equal privileges at the mint, is largely in the majority. That it is in a majority of eight-tenths in the Democratic party there is scarcely a doubt. The bare numerical majority of the coalition in the Senate violates and rides down the Democratic majority and chains it to the triumphal car of the minority and of the Republicans.

It violates the Chicago Democratic platform, as the Senator from Maryland [Mr. Gorman] in his speech so truly said, and adopts, with an amendment, the Sherman law—the cowardly makeshift—as the embodiment of sound Democratic doctrine. This is done under the false pretense that this bill is an unconditional repeal of the Sherman law of 1890, or of the purchasing clauses in that law. So far from that being true, this bill is not an unconditional repeal of any part of the Sherman law of 1890. It is only a repeal of one feature of that law, upon the express condition that every other section and feature of it shall remain

There is not the least ground or warrant in the Democratic national platform for this action, unless that platform was designed only as an artful and deceptive method of destroying siveras a money metal. No mere coalition of Democrats and Republicans, with the Senatorfrom Ohio [Mr. Sherman] in the lead of one faction, or both, can thus depart from and disjoint the Chicago Democratic platform and impose upon me, as a Democrat, the acceptance of this treason to party faith. We are told to vote, and that speedily, upon this travesty of Democracy, dished up and dictated by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Sherman]. Who made this a Democratic greed? This I will presently show made this a Democratic creed? This I will presently show.

If the President had no veto power in reserve with which to defeat the will of the people and the votes in Congress of two-thirds save one, of their representatives, so as to compel Congress to take this or worse, this piping in the market place would go on indefinitely and unheeded, without anyone being found to

As it is, the minority of the Democracy, aided by the reserve force, the veto power must have sway until the whole Democracy can speak. They will speak in no uncertain terms and the Government will yet obey.

The old guard, who have borne the banners of Democracy above harder fought fields than this, will not be alarmed into inaction by the threats of legislative compusion that are made on this floor. We expect that, when the coalition has accomplished its object by the starvation of the people, we shall be upbraided with the charge of moral cowardice, and it will be said that we shrank from contact with a cloture imported from the British Parliament through the Republican Speaker of the House of Representatives in the Fifty-first Congress. That odious tyranny was not born to rule the Senate of the United States. A General Tom Thumb can not do great harm with the club of Hercules

If a Presidential policy is to be worked out through a gag held in one hand and the veto power in the other such assumed powers would so far exceed the grants in the Constitution that the most abject party slave would fly from such a ruler.

We have been threatened here both with the gag of the cloture and the veto of the President because we have asked for information as to what will be done for the people when their silver legal-tender money is destroyed and they are to be taxed to put crutches under the arms of the golden god created by the two Sherman laws of 1873 and 1890 and enthroned by that of 1893. When we are asking these ouestions we are told to vote!

Vote speedily, for the hungry coalition majority will not wait to be questioned. We are not allowed the right of petition so that we may ask the President what he next proposes to do, after the second Sherman bill, that of 1890, has been amended and made more fatal to silver money by that of 1893. Those in the Senate who seem to be conducting business for the President and are supposed to be informed of what is to become of the people, make no answer to the many bills sent them for consideration. They give no sign to indicate what is hidden in the womb of the future.

Is the State-bank tax to be repealed? Are the people to be taxed to borrow gold to meet the $650,000,000 if gold obligations, including the national-bank notes, for all of which, by the flat of the Secretary of the Treasury, we are held liable in gold coin? Are we to add to this another $100,000,000 in order to cover the balances of trade, or the interest on debts, or the dividends on railroad and other stocks, as fast as we earn them, for our foreign creditors? Are we to have a bankrupt law as a forlorn hope? Are we to have an income tax to help those who labor and starve, by forced contributions from the nonproducing classes? Or are we to be left where we have been for twenty years, a constant prey to the speculations of those who can increase or depress the currency at will, and take tithes and tolls at pleasure from the earnings and property of the industrial classes.

One word of encouragement from the President, or from the coalition, would be a grateful relief to the apprehensions of the people and would tend to establish that confidence the want of which is said to be the cause of all the sufferings of the people. Instead of this we are told that conferences and caucuses are in vain, and that compromise is scouted as an unworthy condescension. This is harsh, arbitrary, and unworthy treatment; all the more painful because our political enemies are invited to become the willing instruments of our coercion. From that rod and that staff we can get no comfort. The funeral knell of the liberty of free speech in the Senate, that came from Rhode Island when the force bill was under debate, and only ceased when Colorado and Nevada interposed their sovereign powers, is again jangling in strange and ominous peals in New York and Indiana, and we are threatened with duress, if not with punishment.

I am afraid that the country will be slow in forgetting this wanton method of hasty and summary dealing with the strangulated silver States—the silver States of the West.

They have not deserved this. The first two Sherman laws and the great rupee theft of Great Britain, it is true, have depressed the market value of silver bullion until 65 cents' worth of pure metal will coin into a full dollar. Yet it is equally true that the Bland-Allison law has made that dollar as good as a gold dollar, both to the Government and the people, and no man has been shaved one cent on any silver dollar. If through our "cowardly makeshifts" we have given this advantage to the silver miners, shall we forget how their productions saved our people, if not our Government, from bankruptcy when Baring Brothers, by their wild investments, compelled the Bank of England to borrow money from the Bank of France to tide over that shoal?

England turned to us for gold and got it. This draft would have bankrupted our people had not these silver miners poured into our Treasury $60,000,000 of silver bullion per annum, which, with $33,000,000 of gold from our mines, enabled our people to conduct all their home industries almost without difficulty.

In some remarks that I was permitted to make on the 29th September, I attempted to demonstrate (not in vain, I hope) that these silver miners were forced into this attitude by the false principles upon which the first and second Sherman laws are based, and that they were deprived by those laws of their constitutional right to mine and use silver as a money metal, a metal that is precious, as the redeemer of promises, and to have it coined at the mints as their property.

A people robbed of rights that exist under the Constitution, and were enforced with extreme care under statutes approved by Gen. Washington in 1792, and by Gen. Jackson in 1837, and were undisturbed for eighty years, are not to be treated with contempt because those who deride them have been successful, in a degree, in a conspiracy to destroy such rights and the market value of their property.

The tyrant may scoff at and deride his mutilated victim, but honest men will help him to assert the holy rights of man. will abide with the noble people, whose commission entitles me to a voice in this Chamber, in upholding the rights of our sister States in the mountains of the West, and I will not join the multitude in demanding their destruction because they can point to these States in their distress and helplessness and say, "If thou be king, deliver thyself from thine enemy."

In standing by these States and peoples in their hour of great trial I will violate no tradition or creed of the true Democracy. I am anxious to establish my Democracy on these lines as the friend of the equal rights of gold and silver before the law, so that the larger and stronger men who have of late clambered upon the Democratic platform shall not crowd me off the modest buck seat where I have been during all my manhood and where I intend to abide even unto the end.

On the 28th October, 1893, the following Democrats voted in the Senate for restoring to the people the right of free coinage of silver as it existed under the act of 1792 approved by Gen. Washington, one hundred years ago, and again by Gen. Jackson in 1837, lifty-six years ago. They are: Senators BATE, BERRY, BLACKBURN, BUTLER, CALL, COKE, DANIEL, GEORGE, HARRIS, IRBY, JONES of Arkansas, MARTIN, PASCO, PUGH, ROACH, VANCE, VEST, and WALTHALL, 18 Democrats voting. And the following Democrats were paired in favor of the free coinage of silver, namely: Cockrell, Colquitt, Morgan, and White of California, making 22 Democrats who support the free coinage of silver in the Senate.

The Democrats in the Senate who refused to support the free The Democrats in the Senate who refused to support the free coinage of silver are Messrs. CAFFERY, CAMDEN, FAULKNER, GIBSON, GORMAN, GRAY, HILL, LINDSAY, MCPHERSON, PALMER, RANSOM, SMITH, VILAS, TURPIE, VOORHEES, and WHITE of Louisiana—16 Democrats voting against silver, and the following Democrats were paired against the amendment for its free coinage, namely, BRICE, GORDON, HUNTON, and MILLS—in all, 20 Democratic Senators. Thus we see that it is still the Democratic doctrine in the Senate that the people of the United States demand and will have the free coinpeople of the United States demand and will have the free coinage of silver if it is in the power of the Democracy to restore to them that constitutional and Democratic boon. That this is the Democratic doctrine, with majorities running into hundreds of thousands among the people, will soon be demonstrated in a way that will never be forgotten.

In the list of Senators who voted, or were paired, against silver free coinage are several far better entitled to Democratic consideration than I am, so far as the value of their opinions is concerned, with whom I have been voting and acting for many years on the Democratic side of the question. This will appear more distinctly from some records to which I will presently invite the attention of the Senate.

What may be their reasons for their change of attitude towards this subject is not a matter that concerns me personally; but I wish only to state the fact with emphasis that I have not changed my opinions or my votes on this vital question. I have not abandoned the Democratic creed, which has stood the test of a century of experience, and is the same now as it was in 1792.

There seems to be a charm for them in this third Sherman bill which can neither be broken by the denunciations of our party platform adopted at Chicago, nor by the arguments that we have been able to advance to show that it is the last fatal blowat silver as a money metal.

If we part company on this question, the most important that now concerns the country, it will only be because I refuse to leave the old Democratic ground and to accept the leadership of the honorable Senator from Ohio in his relentless war upon silver as a money metal.

Let us see what Democrats have been doing since 1873 in the Senate to defeat the Senator from Ohio in his war upon bimetallism.

The subject came up in 1878, in the Senate, as it had come up reviously in various elections held. On the 5th of November,

Mr. BLAND moved to suspend the rules and pass the following bill:
An act to authorize the free coinage of the standard silver dollar, and to restore its legal-tender character.

Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be coined, at the several mints of the United States, silver dollars of the weight of 412 grains troy of standard silver, as provided in the act of January 18, 1837, on which shall be the device and superscriptions provided by said act; which coins, together with all silver dollars heretofore coined by the United States of like weight and fineness, shall be a legal tender, at their nominal value, for all debts and dues, public and private, except where otherwise provided by contract; and any owner of silver bullion may deposit the same at any United States coining mint, or as-ay office, to be coined into such dollars, for his benefit, upon the same terms and conditions as gold bullion is deposited for coinage under existing laws. existing laws.

SEC. S. All acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

I have read the whole of the proposed statute in order to show its very identity with the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEFFER] which was voted down in the Senate by Democratic votes last Saturday.

This was agreed to, yeas 164, nays 34, 92 not voting. Among the yeas I find Mr. MILLS of Texas, and Mr. HUNTON of Virginia, and various other of the leading lights of the Democratic party, with whom, Mr. President, I have felt honored in the opportunity of being associated during my political career in this body and long before, so that if a juvenile like myself in political affairs as I was then was misled in respect of the true Democratic doctrine I shall have to ask one of those Senators or both of them to act the part of a scapegoat for me and take my sins upon their shoulders and to run to cover somewhere. have run to cover, Mr. President, and I am afraid they are going to leave me in my sins.

The Stanley Matthews resolution came up in the Senate on the 16th of January, 1878, which involved the whole of the doc-trine contained in the Bland bill, which had passed the House by this tremendous majority, and that resolution I will also read. I put it on the record, not for the information of the Senate, but because I desire my constituents to know what the facts are, in order that they may determine whether they and I have longed to the Democratic party and have been in line with them all these years, or whether we have been so fatally mistaken in our attitude upon this question. The resolution submitted by Mr. Matthews, who was not a Democrat (he was a Republican from Ohio, afterwards a member of the Supreme Court, and a very eminent one), is as follows:

wery eminent one), is as follows:

Whereas by the act entitled "An act to strengthen the public credit," approved March 18, 1889, it was provided and declared that the faith of the United States was thereby solemniy pledged to the payment in coin or its equivalent of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of such obligations had expressly provided that the same might be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver; and.

Whereas all the bonds of the United States authorized to be issued by the act entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," approved July 14, 1870, by the terms of said act, were declared to be redeemable in coin of the then present standard value, bearing interest payable semi-annually in such coin; and

Whereas all bonds of the United States authorized to be issued under the act entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments," approved January 14, 1876, are required to be of the description of bonds of the United States prescribed in the said act of Congress approved July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," and Whereas at the date of the passage of said act of Congress last acrossaid, to wit, the 14th day of July, 1870, the coin of the United States of standard value of that date included silver dollars of the weight of 4124 grains each, declared by the act approved January 18, 1837, entitled "An act supplementary to the act entitled "An act establishing a mint and regulating the coins of the United States," to be a legal tender of payment, according to their nominal value, for any sums whatever: Therefore,

Bett resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring therein), That all the bonds of the United States issued or authorized to be issued under the said acts of Congress hereinbefore recited are payable, principal and interest, at the option of the Government of the United States, in silver colonis as a legal

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] proposed to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary, and that mo-tion was negatived by 19 yeas and 31 nays. Mr. Conkling moved to amend it so as to make it a joint resolution, which was not agreed to—yeas 23, nays 39. The object of Mr. Conkling in making the motion to change it from a concurrent to a joint resolution was obvious. It was that the President of the United States might have a chance to strike it down with his veto.

Mr. Edmunds moved to strike out of the resolution after the ord "interest," in the fourth line, etc., and the vote was taken on that-18 yeas and 44 nays.

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] moved to strike out the words "are payable," in the fifth line, etc. It was disagreed to—yeas 14, nays 41.

Mr. Edmunds moved to postpone the resolution indefinitely, which was disagreed to—yeas 22, nays 43. Now among the yeas there were the following Democrats:

Messrs. Barnum, Bayard, Eaton, Kernan, Lamar, McPher-

SON, and Randolph.

Among the nays were Messrs. Armstrong, Bailey, Beck, Coke, Davis of West Virginia, Dennis, Eustis, Gordon, Grover, Hereford, Johnston, Jones of Florida, McCreery, McDonald, Maxey, Merrimon, Morgan, Ransom, Saulsbury, Thurman, Voorhees, Wallace, Withers. There were 43 votes in the negative, quite a large number of whom were Republicans. On agreeing finally to the resolution the vote was 43 years to 22 nays. Now I will read that vote: The years were Mesers, Allison, Armstrong, Bailey, Beck, Booth, Bruce, CAMERON of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Chaffee, Coke, Conover, Davis of Illinois, Davis of West Virginia, Dennis, Dorsey, Eustis, Ferry, Gordon, Grover, Hereford, Howe, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Kirkwood, McCreery, McDonald, McMillan, Matthews,

So that resolution passed in the Senate by the vote of all the Democrats in that body except seven. The resolution went to the House, and on the 29th of January, 1878, the preamble and resolution were adopted by a vote of 189 years to 79 nays. Of course amongst the years the Democrats were very greatly in the majority. majority.

This subject came up again in the Fifty-first Congress, in 1890. It was upon a bill that had passed the House of Representatives and come over to the Senate, if I have it right, and I think I have. It was a bill for the coinage of silver money under the act of 1837, with certain additional provisions in it, which were quite in harmony with the general perport of the act. It passed the House of Representatives, it seems, by a vete of 135 year to 119 nays. It was considered in the Senate on a report from the Finance Committee made by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] on the 11th day of June, 1890, and after considerable debate and many motions for amendment and postponement, etc. Mr. Plumb, of Kansas, presented the following substitute for

That from and after the date of the passage of this act the unit of value in the United States shall be the dollar, and the same may be coined of 412½ grains of standard sliver or of 25.8 grains of standard gold, and the said coins shall be equally legal tender for all sums whatever.

That hereafter any owner of sliver or gold buillon may deposit the same at any mint of the United States, to be formed into standard dollars or bars for his benefit and without charge; but it shall be lawful to refuse any deposit of less value than $100, or any buillon so base as to be unsuitable for the operations of the mint

Mr. Blaze proposed an amendment to it and Mr. Vest moved to change the last clause of the first sentence of Mr. Plumb's substitute, so as to read:

And the said coins shall be legal tender for all debts, public and private Mr. Plumb's substitute was then agreed to-year 43, nays 24.

There were only three Democrats in that minority. That bill failed to become a law, it having been substituted by what is now known as the Sherman act of 1890, which was passed on the 14th of July, 1890, every Democrat in the Senate voting against There again it appears that I was not only with the Democratic party in my views upon this subject, but that a very large number of Democrats entertained the same idea of what the duty of a Democrat was in respect to the free coinage of silver.

Then the subject came up again in the House of Representatives in the Fifty-second Congress, the 7th of March, 1892, on a resolution reported from the Committee on Rules by Mr. CATCHINGS, of the House, that "after the morning hour the House proceed to the consideration of H. R. 4426, being a bill for the free coinage of gold and silver, for the issue of coin notes, and for other purposes, and should mid bill be not sconer disposed of the House shall continue the consideration thereof," etc.

That was taken up on a vote of 195 yeas to 73 nays, and after a long struggle in the House of Representatives the bill came over

On July 1,1892, the bill S. 51, to provide for the free coinage of gold and silver bullion, and for other purposes, was up. It is a mere repetition in substance, not exactly identical in language, with the act of 1837.

Mr. DOLPH moved to recommit the bill, and on that motion there were 28 yeas, and the nays were 31. The votes for recommittal were:

Yeas-Messrs. Allison, Brice, Carey, Carlisle, Cullom, DAVIS, DAWES, DIXON, DOLPH, Felton, FRYE, GALLINGER, GOM-MAN, GRAY, HALD, HANSBROUGH, HAWLEY, MCPHERSON, MANDERSON, PALMER, Perkins, PLATT, PROCTOR, Sawyer, STOCKBEIDGE, WATTEN, WASHBURN, WHITE—28.

The final result was that the Senator from Missouri [Mr.VEST] substituted all of the proposed legislation by an out-and-out straight free-coinage bill, the best one, I think, that I have ever seen since the act of 1837, and on its final passage the yeas were 29 and the nays were 25. On that the yeas were:

Now, I have sufficiently shown, without going into greater de-Now, I have sufficiently shown, without going into greater details, that the Senate of the United States by the vote which it gave, and the Democrats in the Senate by the vote that they gave, which I have just been reading and which seems to have been recorded on the 1st of July, 1892, gave their definition to the meaning of the platform of the Chicago convention of 1892, which was adopted June 1, just a month before, in which it is stated in Article VII:

SEC. 7. We denounce the Republican legislation known as the Sherman act of 1890 as a cowardly makeshift, fraught with possibilities of danger in the future which should make all of its supporters, as well as its author, anxious for its speedy repeal. We hold to the use of both gold and silver as the standard money of the country and to the coinage of both gold and silver without discriminating against either metal or charge for mintage, but the dollar unit of coinage of both metals must be of equal intrinsic and exchangeable value, or be adjusted through finternational agreement or by such safeguards of legislation as shall insure the maintenance of the parity of the two metals and the equal power of every dollar at all times in the markets and in the payment of debts; and we demand that all paper currency shall be kept at par with and redeemable in such coin. We insist upon this policy as especially necessary for the protection of the farmers and laboring classes, the first and most defenseless victims of unstable money and a fluctuating currency.

Now, that was the Democratic interpretation in the Senate of the meaning of that platform. The Democrate who voted for the free coinage of silver on the lat of July, 1892, in this body, did not mean to separate themselves from the party. They knew of the existence of this platform. They interpreted its meaning. It went to the country, and after that vote in the Senate of the United States I could go to my constituents in Alabama, and did go to them, and informed them that, whatever there might be of doubt or distrust connected with the vague expressions and uncertainties of the seventh clause of the Chicago platform, so far as the Democracy in the Senate and in the House were concerned it had all been removed: that we had made and affirmed the declaration in favor of the free coinage of silver in accordance with the act of 1837, which had been signed by Gen. Jackson.

There was firm ground to stand upon. We believed it. If I had gone to the State of Alabama and told the Democrats of that State the first thing that should be done by the President of the United States after we should have elected him, or contributed our votes to his election, would have been to have put silver in a position from which there was no possible extrication, that it was to die in the Senate at the hands of its friends or in the House of Representatives and by his command, that State at least would never have cast its vote for him. There is no question about that. I have told him so, of course in the most friendly, cordial, and kindly manner, for that is exactly the sentiment that rules in my bosom in respect to the President of the United States.

Not that only, but I have great pride in him as a Democrat, and great hopes of the success of his power in the relief of the country from other mischiefs besides this which are coming upon us. But I had not any more distrust that the attitude of the Democratic party was known upon this question, was thoroughly established, was beyond doubt or disputation—I had no more distruct of it than I have of my own existence. You can fancy the surprise with which I encountered here, not an appeal to the men who passed that bill, not asking them to go into council with the rest of the Democrats and see whether it were not better under existing conditions and electromate to waive the attitude we took in July, 1890, but to be confronted with an alliance that had already been formed, a coalition that had already been established by outside arrangements with the honorable Senator from Ohio, to whom was delivered, it appears, the key of the situation, and who had the supreme office delegated to him by some authority—I do not know and I do not care what it was-to dictate to the Senate of the United States and to the Government what should be its policy in respect to silver.

am not apt, Mr. President, to take umbrage at being neg lected or overlooked. I do not care anything about the complimentary attentions of any man who lives, if I have a clear conscience and am permitted to act upon a sense of duty formed Whenever gentlemen can not agree with me about matters of that kind honors are simply easy between us. But I feel as a Democrat and as one of a majority of this body, after that platform had been adopted at Chicago, and after we had made this firm declaration to return to the platform of 1837, old Jackson's platform, there was something in the nature of a consideration due to the men who felt thus impelled to give their votes in this body and to define their course on this

But instead of that we have been entirely overslaughed; and when we presume to enter into a compromise, although we are when we presume to eater in a somptomise, attnoop we are thrown buck upon the arbitrary demands that this bill must pass just as it has been framed by the dictation of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], no more and no less, and we must look to the future for our relief.

Tee Senate would weary with me if I should undertake to trace up the origin of this Democratic doctrine, and yet I can not forbear to quote a very few sentences from that most eminent Democrat, Thomas Jefferson, on this subject, to show that we are in line with him also. He says:

line with him also. He says:

It is a litigated question, whether the circulation of paper, rather than of specie, is a good or an evil. In the opinion of England and of English writers it is a good; in that of all other nations, it is an evil; and excepting England and her copyrist, the United States, there is not a nation existing, I believe, which tolerates a paper circulation. The experiment is going on, however desperately in England, pretty boldly with us, and at the end of the chapter, we shall see which opinion experience approves; for I believe it to be one of those cases where mercantile clamor will bear down reason, until fa is corrected by ruin. In the meantime, however, let us reason on this new call for a national bank.

Mr. Jefferson was opposed to national banks, and at that stage of the case he was opposed to paper money, because he did not believe that the Government had sufficient control over the regulation of the volume of paper money to keep it in proper parallel lines with the redeeming power that lay in the gold and silver, which are at the foundation of all these promises.

He says further in criticism of Adam Smith:

He says further in criticism of Adam Smith:

The only advantage which Smith proposes by substituting paper in the room of gold and silver money (B 2, c. 2, 434) is "to replace an expensive instrument with one much less costly, and sometimes equally convenient;" that is to say (page 437), "to allow the gold and silver to be sent abroad and converted into foreign goods," and to substitute paper as being a cheaper measure. But this makes no addition to the stock or capital of the nation. The coin sent out was worth as much while in the country as the goods imported and taking its place. It is only, then, a change of form in a part of the national capital from that of gold and silver to other goods. He admits, too, that while a part of the goods received in exchange for the coin exported may be materials, tools, and provisions for the employment of an additional industry, a part also may be taken back in foreign wines, silks, etc., to be consumed by idle people who produce nothing; and so far the substitution promotes prodigality, increases expense and consumption without increasing production. So far, also, then, it bessens the capital of the nation. What may be the amount which the conversion of the part exchanged for productive goods may add to the former productive mass, it is not easy to secretain, "because," as he says (page 44), "it is impossible to determine what is the proportion which the circulating money of any country bears to the whole value of the annual produce."

He goes on to discuss those questions to which I do not now

He goes on to discuss those questions to which I do not now desire to call attention further. When speaking of each or money he always speaks of gold and silver. He uses them in conjunction. It never occurred to the mind of that wise statesman that a period could ever arise in the United States when a divorce between gold and silver should become necessary. It has never arisen and it never will arise. Even at this very moment our legislation, our restrictions upon the use of silver, the legislation of foreign countries, will drive the productive labors of the people of the world into the gold mines; and it will not be five years after the passage of this law until the country will do as Germany did, and as other countries in Europe have done, abandon the gold standard and adopt again the bimetallic standard, because silver has got to be the scarcer metal. There is no doubt at all about that.

On this subject perhaps I had better not volunteer any statement. I have great authority, however, for the statement I have made. There is no doubt at all that the production of gold by placer mining is very much cheaper labor. It yields more abundantly in the way of profit to the mere day laborer than the production of silver, which requires large investments to carry on silver mines. However, I shall not go any further in the effort to illustrate that, but I will read a little further from Mr. Jefferson. This is a letter to Mr. John W. Eppes:

In this state of things we are called on to add ninety millions more to the circulation. Proceeding in this career, it is infallible that we must end where therevolutionary paper ended. Two hundred millions was the whole amount of all the emissions of the old Congress, at which point their bills ceased to circulate. We are now at that sum; but with treble the population and of course a longer tether. Our depreciation is, as yet, but at about 2 for 1. Owing to the support its credit receives from the small reservoirs of specia in the vaults of the banks, it is impossible to say at what point their notes will stop. Nothing is necessary to effect it but a general alarm; and that may take place whenever the public shall begin to reflect on and perceive the impossibility that the banks should repay this sum. At present, caution is inspired no farther than to keep prudent men from selling property on long paymeats. Let us suppose the panic to arise at three hundred millions, about to which every session of the Legislatures hasten us by long strides. Nobody dreams that they would have three hundred millions of specie to satisfy the holders of their notes.

Were they even to stop now no one supposes they have two hundred millions in cash, or even the sixty-six and two-thirds millions, to which amount alone the law obliges them to repay. One hundred and thirty-three and one-third millions of loss, then, is thrown on the public by law; and as the sixty-six and two-thirds, which they are legally bound to pay, and ought to have in their vaults, everyone knows there is no such amount of cash in the United States, and what would be the course with what they really have there? Their notes are refused. Cash is called for. The inhabitants of the banking towns will get what is in the vaults, until a few banks declare their insolvency; when, the general crush becoming evident, the others will with draw even the cash they have, declare their banking towns will get what is in the vaults, until a few banks declare their insolvency; when, the general crush becoming evident, the others will with a wear they to do? Bring suits? A million of creditors bring a million of suits against John Nokes and Robert Styles whereseever to be found? All nonsense. The loss is total.

His description of a panic produced by expanding the volume paper money seems to be a prophecy of the troubles we are now having with the banks. We have grown very much larger than Mr. Jefferson I think ever supposed we could grow in so short a period, and we conse-quently have an expanded use and a still expanding use for paper money, and it has got to be one of the established institutions of the country. But, Mr. President, the duty has arisen and has increased in its obligations every step we have taken that we should be more and more cautious and careful in respect of the restraints to be imposed upon the issue of paper money. We have out a vast amount of paper-money obligations of the Government of the United States, and there is no dollar out to-day in the hands of the people, issued directly or indirectly by the Government of the United States, including the nationalbank notes, that the Government is not responsible for its re-demption in coin. When you come to the silver certificates the Government has reserved to itself the right and option of redemption in silver coin, and yet we are told that as an act of magnanimity, or as an act of pride, or something like that—I can hardly characterize it—as much as $5,000,000 of gold have been paid out of the Treasury of the United States during this time of distress for the redemption of silver certificates

We know that the gold has been paid out into the hands of the employés of the Government of the United States. It is circulated here through the hands of these pages and the em-ployés of the Senate. Gold has been distributed among us here in the payment of salaries by the Government of the United States in the midst of all this outery for its accumulation and retention in the Treasury. The intent and purpose seems to be in every possible direction, both by precept and by example, to compel the rejection of silver and whatever else represents silver, even the silver certificates in that character from the circulation and convert them into gold on demand.

Well, that may be another way of killing silver. They need to treasure the new others the processors and the convert to any others.

well, that may be another way of killing silver. They need not resort to any other. They have got enough now. This bill will kill it effectually enough.

We already refuse free coinage to silver on terms of equality with gold at the mint. The people can not have it coined. We repeal this law and say there shall be no more silver purchased by the United States for coinage; and thereupon we break the market entirely; and the silver producers who may be reaften be by the United States for comage, and thereupen we reafter be market entirely; and the silver producers who may hereafter be rash and indiscreet enough to dig it from the earth as a matter of profit will find that they must go abroad with it, and sell it in countries with hostile legislation against silver. They must in countries with hostile legislation against silver. They must find Asiatics or some other people to buy it, if they can find anybody using it, or else they must go to the trinket shops, the tinker shops, the jewelry shops, and sell it there; or it must be used for the purposes of deceration, or something like that.

This bill, when it has had its way with silver, utterly destroys it as money in every possible sense and conception; there is nothing of it left.

So now, with this vast mass of paper money issued by the United States, payable in coin, which the Senate of the United States years and years ago, in 1878, voted was payable in silver dollars as well as in gold coin, when all of this mass of money has stricken from its foundation any support of silver, in so much that no Treasury officer will pay out silver in the redemption of any promise of the Government whatever, what becomes of this any promise of the Government whatever, what becomes of this enormous disparity between the cash spoken of by Mr. Jefferson—the gold, if you please—in the Treasury of the United States, or within the power of the Treasury of the United States to accumulate, and this vast mass of debt amounting to 8 or 10 or 12 to 1? What have you got then to pledge to the people of the United States that this Government will be able or will ever undertake to redeem all of these paper promises in gold that you have got out?

that you have got out?
You have one resource, that to which you have never failed to resort. You have the resource of taxing the patient, uncomplaining, patriotic, honest, industrious, and suffering people; and to that you come. There you land. There this bill lands you; and the third chapter in the revelation of this plan is that you shall buy $200,000,000 of gold bonds supported by taxation upon the people. You take from the people the money that they jure upon, that they live with, that they use in their daily transactions, that they can not get along without. You take from them the dollar, except the limited amount that you have got here, that may yet be coined according to the remains of the Sherman act which you canonize and put in the statute as something worthy of worship by Democrats. You reserve that, and allow it to lie in bullion in these vaults or to be coined according to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. The $150,000,000 that have been issued under this law you say shall when they are redeemed and paid into the Treasury be reissued, and they shall remain reissued, and as often as you redeem them they shall remain reissued, thus leaving a demand upon the Treasury of the United States of a specific character under this bill of $150,000,000 that have been as the service of the service of the treasury of the United States of a specific character under this bill of $150,000,000 that they are the service of the treasury of the United States of a specific character under this bill of $150,000,000 the treasury of the United States of a specific character under this bill of $150,000,000 the treasury of the United States of a specific character under this bill of $150,000,000 the treasury of the United States of a specific character under this bill of $150,000,000 the treasury of the United States of a specific character under this bill of $150,000,000 the treasury of the United States of a specific character under this bill of $150,000,000 the treasury of the United States of a specific cha United States of a specific character under this bill of $150,000,

You leave it there and yet you pretend to try to convince the common, plain-minded, simple people of the United States that you are not trying to foist up a goldocracy in the United States, but that you are trying to maintain the parity of silver and gold. Will you maintain the parity of silver by locking it up in the vaults of the United States and taxing the people to get coin to Circulate around to pay the men who want to speculate upon the Treasury of the United States continually?

Mr. President, at the risk of wearying the Senate and the risk of my own health I will go a little further into this matter.

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES] in a speech covering four days of time in this body has made a contribution to the literature and history and philosophy and political economy connected with the subject of silver and gold and money at large which will illustrate the history of the United States as one of its most beautiful chapters in all time to come. I think there is no Senator here, and I think there is no political economist in the United States, who would ever undertake to answer the great argument made by the Senator from Nevada upon this subject. But that has all gone to the winds. The people of the United States are in a condition of turmoil and distress, and they are not prepared to take a dispassionate view of this great question. I found, when he was analyzing the subject, very much to my designation. light, that he and I had taken similar views of a certain feature. simply one feature of this question, about which I desire to say something, because it is one that is not attended to usually, and it is very important to the industrial classes of the United States.

I allude to the relations of labor to the production of the precious metals.

GOLD AND SILVER THE PRODUCT OF LABOR AND NOT OF THE LAWS.

The money metals, gold and silver, when coined are money.

Paper promises when printed and circulated as currency are not money, but promises to pay money. Money and credit are as distinct as paper is distinct from gold or silver. Paper promises are credit; gold and silver coins are money.

Money is given a fixed value in the payment of debts by legals.

Money is given a fixed value in the payment of debts by legal-tender laws. In all other respects the value of money is calcu-lated only with reference to the amount or quantity it will purchase in the markets of what are called staple commodities, such

This power of money is called its purchasing power, and that element of its power can not be fixed or regulated by law. Sometimes this purchasing power of money is wildly exaggerated, or as irrationally depressed by the lusts, passions, or follies of men. But these exceptional departures from the ordinary admeasure-ments of the relative values of money and property are not con-sidered when we compute the actual value of money as compared with the actual or commercial value of property It is true, beyond candid disputation, that money and the descriptions of property that are indispensable to civilized life, are measured, as to their selling or exchangeable value, by the abundance of the one and the scarcity of the other in the markets where the exchange takes place—the open markets of com-

Money is bought and sold in the open markets, just as goods are bought and sold. In that sense, all money is a commodity; but of all other commodities it is a measure of value. A dollar is sold in such markets for a bushel of wheat or for two bushels of wheat, according to the abundance of the one or the scarcity of the other; but the measure of the dollar and the measure of the bushel are both fixed by law, and are equally arbitrary. The dollar has a value imputed to it by law and measured by law whether it is statute law or the law of custom, or the law of whether it is statute law or the law of custom, or the law of commercial usage; but the quantity of the wheat given in exchange for the dollar is measured by agreement. The intrinsic usefulness of the wheat creates the market, and the impulse of necessity forces the sale. The incentive of gain or of stimulates the market, but human necessity creates it. The incentive of gain or of hunger all cases the price or value of the wheat is ascertained by agree

Supposing the money to be sound, without which attribute it could not be money, but would be only a token or a mere crude commodity, the abundance of it in the market is the fact that determines how much wheat a dollar will purchase. The law of necessity operates first, and with the greater pressure, upon the owner of the wheat. It is his necessities, either actual, real, or owner of the wheat. It is his necessities, chair accurat, real, or speculative, that causes him to bring his grain for sale to the open market. He is forced to sell it for money, because that is the convenient or customary method of exchanging it for other goods. He has more than he needs for consumption, and he must sell his surplus or lose it; or he needs other things which he can only buy with money, or he owes debts that he can only he can only buy with money, or he owes debts that he can only pay with money.

These wants force him to sell his surplus wheat. His necessities are absolute and imperative. He must sell his wheat. This situation describes the relation that every production holds to money in every open market, and also the relation that labor holds to money in every human vocation. Supplies for human consumption perish, while coin is nearly imperishable. The necessity of sale of the leading productions of labor is all-pervading and irresistible, and it is this that creates markets. It is the offer to sell that opens the market. As a rule, almost without exception, this offer must be made by the producer to without exception, this offer must be made by the producer to his disadvantage. Money, after it has supplied to its owner according to his necessities, real or imaginary, what is needed, if any surplus is left over, becomes capital.

When the offer to sell produce or labor is addressed to capital.

as it most uniformly is, the price of the produce or labor is fixed by the capitalist. This is always the case unless an abnormal scarcity of productions causes money to seek investment in them. This seldom occurs, if ever, when money is scarce. When money is scarce the producer is forced by necessity to hunt it up and to offer great inducements in the way of bargains to the capitalist. The scarcity of money enables its holder always to depress prices, even when produce is comparatively equally scarce. This is due to the fact that money is in demand always and for every necessity.

The demand never ceases, because it represents every human necessity

Capital can not increase in the hands of its owner without taxing the necessities of mankind. It has no growth except through this form of taxation. It can not grow, it can only be added to. Interest laws, usurious contracts, and the markets are the chief instrumentalities through which this taxation is imposed and collected. In either form its power is irresistible, and its exactions are without limit unless the laws control and limit the pressure of capital, the money power, upon the necessities of mankind, and this can only be done by increasing its volume. Capital will tax necessity to the uttermost, and to the degree of Capital will tax necessity to the uttermost, and to the degree of the absolute confiscation of property unless it is restrained as to the interest on loans, or its power is weakened or scattered by the counteracting power of the laws in the increase and diffusion of its volume.

If money is scarce in the markets (and, being scarce, it is always in the hands of a small number of people), the tax upon the necessities of the man who brings his produce or his labor to that market is proportionally heavy. The only safety of persons thus situated against the exorbitant taxation of their necessities of the safety of the control of the safety of the safety of the control of the safety of sities must be in the amount of money in the market, and in the competition that is created by its being in the hands of numerous persons, seeking for speculative profits or commissions or interest or usury

If the necessities of life and civilization compel wheat-growers to send 100,000,000 bushels of wheat to New York for a market, to send 100,000,000 bushels of wheat to New York for a market, and $100,000,000 are in that market ready to be invested in wheat, for consumption, to meet human necessities, the price of the wheat would be $1 per bushel. If only $50,000,000 were found in that market for the purchase of wheat, the price would be 50 cents per bushel. At a higher rate, wheat could not be sold for cash. If the necessities of the people at large, in reach of the New York market, were equal to the consumption of the 100,000,000 bushels of wheat, they would be so imperative and unsuighble that the wheat thus "corpored" by the scarcity of voidable that the wheat thus "cornered" by the scarcity of money or by its concentration in the hands of a few capitalists, would yield them 50 per cent profit.

In the case supposed, which is illustrated, if it is not demonstrated in practical commerce, very frequently the evil to be remedied is the too great scarcity of money as compared with the productions of the wheat-growers and with the demands of conproductions of the wheat-growers and with the demands of consumers. I do not care now to enter upon any discussion of the effect of overproduction in lowering the price of wheat in certain seasons, as is sometimes alleged, but was never true of any great staple of food or raiment. It is enough for my purposes that a scarcity of money in the markets, no matter how it comes about, is a disastrous tax upon all production and all labor.

Such a scarcity of money, of legal-tender power, as compared with the volume of the indebtedness of the people, must be totally destructive of the substance of the people and the death of industry, enterprise, credit, and commercial morality. It would fall like a blight upon a vast number of people, who could only fall like a blight upon a vast number of people, who could only have even hope restored to them by bankrupt laws. Turning aside from the temptation of a wider treatment of the subject, my inquiry is addressed to the people, for it awakeus no response here. What is the duty of government in respect of the supply of money—not promises, or credits, or tokens, but money—to the people? By money I mean coins made of the only precious metals, the only money metals now known to mankind, gold and silver.

These are the only metals that the common opinion of mankind and the universal usages of the markets and the laws of trade recognize as money metals. This is the one fact that can not be denied or displaced even by the imagination. The duty of our Government, and, indeed, of all governments, which they everywhere obey and perform, is to coin these metals into money and regulate by law their ratio of value when coined with each other, and to impart to them the compulsory power of legal tender in the payment of debts.

The laws of our country can go no further than this in regulating the value of money. Whatever other commercial value these coins may have is a matter of agreement between the buyer and seller, which is properly described as their purchasing power. our Government can not engage in the business of producing these metals by digging them from the earth. That is a private employment which the people may engage in but the Government has no rightor power to pursue. These metals are the product of labor and skill, as much so as cotton, silk, wool, or

In the experience of mankind, as established through centu-ries and cycles, the product of a day's labor in producing these ries and cycles, the product of a day's labor in producing these metals is nearly equal to a pennyweight of gold or an onne of silver, and this fact is very influential in the admeasurement of the ratio between them. Indeed this is the safest basis for a ratio between gold and silver. The labor that yields an ounce of silver will, as a rule, yield a pennyweight of gold. When gold or silver is coined it is the conversion of labor and skill into money by operation of law. To say that too much of this labor can be bestowed upon the production of these metals is absurd. It has never been true and can never be true that the world has been or will be overstocked with the precious metals. world has been or will be overstocked with the precious metals or either of them. If the labor of the miner does not pay when measured with the price of the products of labor in other pursuits it will cease, and when the labor stops the production of precious metals ends.

When the petroleum wells came in the labor expended in whale fishing ceased, or nearly so. When cotton came in the flax culture nearly ceased; when iron ties came in the produchax cuture hearly ceased; when from thes came in the produc-tion of hempen ropes was nearly ended. But when labor ceases to produce silver, because of its low purchasing power, there is no substitute but gold that can take its place. Its rival—gold— will usurp the field of consumption, but instead of supplying its loss it will make its loss doubly felt among the poor, in the in-crease of the burden of debts and the corresponding decrease of the prices of their labor. the prices of their labor.

The labor that produces gold and silver is bestowed on personal account and not on Government account. In the same way labor is bestowed in the production of wheat or cotton, and so of the capital employed in mining for precious metals. In the United States as, indeed, in all countries except in the prison mines of Siberia, the Government never works a mine of gold or silver on Government account. It would reverse, if it would not revolutionize the entire theory of the Government of the United States and of every State in the Union, to engage in the mining of gold and silver on Government account, even upon the public lands owned by the United States, where the mines yet undiscovered are most likely to be found. The United States could not open mines and work them on Government account any more than the Congress could open and cultivate wheat farms or vineyards, and convert the wheat into flour and the grapes into wine, on the public domain.

The supply of gold and silver must come entirely from private sources and not from governmental action, and the supply of these metals can neither be increased or diminished by any power of the law directly forbidding or limiting the production.

The supply of all other productions useful for man comes from the same source, personal labor and personal skill, and, as the quantity of other productions increases, and as the demand for them is greater day by day and year by year, labor will find profitable employment in the production of precious metals, which when coined are the representatives in commerce of the growth of the fruits of all other labor.

It is the labor employed in gold and silver mining and in all other industries that is found engaging in the one pursuit or the other, according to the profit it will yield to the laborer. The labor shifts back and forth from the mines to the farms and factories, and increases the yield from the one employment or the by a law that is as common and as effectual in commerce as the law that rules the waters of the earth in the unceasing effort to produce and maintain a common level.

There is never too much wheat. Hungry mouths are always eady somewhere in the circuit of commercial intercourse in the world to consume more bread than they can get. price of the wheat is not remunerative, because the money to buy it is too scarce, production is shortened, hunger increases and the poor who labor in other industries are taxed on their bread by corners and combinations which the scarcity of money invites, and no law, it seems, is strong enough to prevent these cruel exactions.

The only possible relief in the supply of real money is to permit or induce the miner to increase the supply of gold and silver to correspond with the demands of commerce. I do not consider to correspond with the demands of commerce. I do not consider that it is a real relief to such a situation to supply the deficit of gold and silver by the issue of promises to pay money, on demand, for their redemption at some future time, and to secure that promise by taxation of the people.

That is a temporary makeshift in which the people are to loan their credit to the Government, or to the banks, and pay taxes to make the credit good. If such credit is not based on gold and silver, or upon taxation, it is a costly delusion and a fraud which only adds to the distress of the people. It is flat money, which is always followed by the flat of destruction.

Why were banks ever created by law with power to issue bills to circulate as money if there was no need for an expansion of to circulate as money if there was no need for an expansion of currency beyond the supply of gold and silver money? Will it be said that this was done, and this new machine for making be said that this was done, and this new machine for making money was contrived for the mere purpose of greater convenience in transporting wealth from place to place? If such had been the purpose why did they in the very beginning of banking issue three dollars of paper for one of gold and silver in the vaults of the banks? Banking by the issue of paper money was first practiced in the fourteenth century in Venice, and other great companies it is a part to be desired to the fourteenth century in Venice, and other great commercial cities along the Mediterranean Sea.

The necessity for banks arose from no other cause than the want of sufficient gold and silver coinage to supply the purchasing power necessary to the handling and interchange of the productions forming commerce in those marts of trade at prices that would invite their presence there. They began as a con-venience, and soon became a necessity; but banks, which are the coiners of credit, have never been able to supplant or substitute the powers of governments to coin money of gold and silver, and their issues have had no par value except as they have been redeemable in coin.

A bank bill that is not redeemable in coin is branded as a fraud the world over, and has been so condemned during all periods since they were first issued to circulate as money. Yet their supply of currency to the commercial world became indispensable. If this substitute for money were driven from circulation in the transactions of commerce, it need scarcely be said that it would bankrupt the commercial world. Or if either gold or silver were removed from the foundations upon which such issues are based, it is quite as true that the confidence of all commercial dealers would correspondingly cease to the destruction of the business of millions of people.

Labor, then, coined into money, is the basis of all banking, as well as the life-blood of all civil government. Labor, thus coined, is the only money basis that has ever existed, or that can be devised; for the world of mankind will have no other basis of the redemption of promises. Labor supplies every human want; the metals that are, when coined, the measures of value in every human want; the metals that are, when coined, the measures of value in every human want; the metals that are, when coined, the measures of value in every human want; the measures of value in every human wa man transaction that is based upon contract; and the means of redeeming every promise, express or implied, for the payment of money. In producing the metals that admeasure values, labor is employed, voluntarily, either in the mining of gold or silver, and gets its rewards from commerce.

To stop the production of either metal or to disparage it by laws is to cut off from mankind a useful employment to the extent of the restriction so imposed upon it. This would be bad enough if it was applied to wheat in order to give to corn or rice a greater value, but when it is applied in its effects to the entire mass and volume of commerce, and to every business transaction, it is a blight upon every industry and a direct tax upon every producer.

If the restriction is upon silver in order to enhance the price of gold, when the cooperation of both metals in supporting the credit system called banking is never sufficient, even at the extreme possible limit of production, the disastrous effects are always perilous, and frequently they wreck the business and paralyze the industries of whole nations, and sometimes of half the civilized world. Of this fact recent events are a demonstration.

This is the policy we are now pursuing; this is the scheme of the single gold standard and coinage prescribed by the Sherman act and its legitimate offspring, the "cowardly makeshift" of the Sherman act of 1890; and the present still more cowardly makeshift in the amendatory act we are now considering under the false and fraudulent assertion everywhere believed, that it is a bill for the unconditional repeal of the Sherman act of 1890. And all this is done to give the national banks a wider field for And all this is done to give the national banks a where held for speculation in paper credits, and the stock gamblers, brokers, and corner ambuscaders a safer and more complete control of all corporations, factories, mines, fields, farms, and forests; and to aid trusts and conspiracies with the national credit, based on the taxation of the people.

The United States Government in its financial policy is a bank of issue and redemption, and it also receives on deposit silver and gold coins, for which it issues paper promises. Except in the single matter of coining gold on the demand of one who deposits bullion, the Government is a banking institution of the sort I have just described. The national banks have, as banks of issue and as banks of deposit for public money, become merely fiscal agencies, instrumentalities of the Government, which is the mother bank.

They are a favored lot of public pets and leeches, and one is not surprised when they "wax fat and kick."

As for their issues of bank notes as money, they have no responsibility. The Government pays them 4½ per cent interest in quarterly payments on all the bills they issue. This is taxed out of the people, and averages, I think, $15,000,000 each year, and redeems their circulation when they break. A case is ensily possible with these banks, that their officers, with a capital of, say, $100,000, can invest it in United States bonds, and draw interest on them at 41 per cent; they can then get a line of deposits from the people of, say, $300,000, and get $90,000 of national-bank notes from the Government. They can steal the whole sum and convert it into foreign exchange, send it abroad in the form of gold or foreign exchange, and leave the Government with $390,000 less gold in the Treasury: their depositors without a dollar of indemnity; and get away with the whole face value of their bonds, except $10,000. That is the whole sum that the banks put up as security for their honesty and good faith. True, the Government gets $100,000 of its bonds, but the thieves have pocketed $90,000 of its gold in the Treasury and $300,000 from depositors, and have escaped with it

This case has not happened, so far as I know, though I have heard of such a case, it may never happen, but none the less does the possibility of such an occurrence show that the banking sys-tem is not sufficiently protected. The depositors have virtually no security against peculating bank officers. Their only real security is in the honesty of the officers of the banks, which has not very often been disproved but sometimes it has.

not very often been disproved but sometimes it has.

That many of them are well adapted to the perpetration of even such frauds as I have shown to be possible under our ill-guarded system, is shown by the graphic and burning description of them which I find in the following interview of the Senator from Indiana, in a Chicago gold-standard newspaper of recent date. This is a bitter arraignment, that if made by me, I could only make it at the expense of the contemptuous scorn and villification of every great daily paper in New York. The Senator is fortunate in the forbearance of his recent allies.

This is what the Senator save about the banks in that inter-

This is what the Senator says about the banks in that interview, which I suppose is correct. I think it is, as it has appeared without contradiction, so far as I have seen:

LE CALLS THEM THIEVES—SENATOR VOORNESS DENOUNCES THE BANKERS OF NEW YORK—BITTER LANGUAGE USED BY THE INDIANA STATESMAN WHEN SPEAKING OF THE FINANCIERS OF GOTHAM—DECLARES THAT MONEY IS THEIR GOD AND CLAIMS THEY WOULD SCRUPLE AT NOTHING TO OBTAIN IT—WHY HE FAVORS THE REPEAL OF THE PURCHASING CLAUSE OF THE

WASHINGTON, D. C., September 19.

"My full and complete opinion," said Senator Voorhees, "of that combine of impertinent robbers and thieves, the banks of New York, it would not be politic for you to print. You couldn't get the telegraph company to handle the message. My views of the New York banks and their methods and their attitudes in this present debate in the Senate are that they add insolence to robbery and slanderous lying to bighwayism.

"I have been in Congress thirty-two years. Call it success or what you please, its corner stone, at least, was what is my present opinion of these New York banks. I haveever found them plundering, marauding, and stealing the goods and hopes of the people, like so many cattle-lifting flighland caterans. There is not an honest hair in all their heads, not a broad or patriotic motive in all their bosoms. They are narrow, selfish, utterly mean, and dishonest. No honest man takes his eyes off them for a moment; they would pick his pocket if he did.

"If you turn your back they use the assassin's knife upon you like so many lurking, skulking, cowardly Corsicans of money. Go to your Bibles and read what the Savioursaid of the New York banks and every member of their tribe. He described them as whited sepulchers filled with dead men's bones, as the robber of the widow and the devourer of the orphan, as willing to barter God for money or negotiate a mortgage on their hopes of heaven, allow a foreclosure and stay away from the sale, and all for money.

DESTITUTE.

"In the eagerness of their sharkish greed they abandon honor, and right, and justice, and decency, and fill and gorge their belies on the best posses of a world. They would make a boiled dimer of the brightest prospects of a world. They would make a boiled dimer of the brightest prospects of mankind. Never in my life have I been their friend northey mine. I make no concord, no alliance, with such criminal elements. When I took my position for the unconditional repeal of the Sherman law purchasing clause I had neither thought nor care for the New York banks. Neither did I regard my position as being for gold and against silver. Gold and silver and their part in the finances of the country are not disposed of by passing the Voorhees or the Wilson bill. You repeal the silver-purchase clause of the Sherman law, that's all you do: that's all you squeeze out of it. I am a silver man to-day, and a far better friend to silver than are those who obstruct public business in the Senate.

"My position as chairman of the Finance Committee called me to lead this fight. I have led it honestly, fearlessly, courting no man's favor, and Ishall lead it to the end. When the New York bankers impute or ascribe to me any hidden motive for silver, any treachery to the measures I am assuming to support, they are liars and foul slanderers whom I shall not hesitate to stigmatize as such. The fact that to-day both I and the New York banks desire the same thing—the unconditional repeal of the Shermanlaw—need contuse no one as to our relations. My attitude toward them is what it always was and what it always will be to that which is corrupt and utterly venal.

TRAVELING THE SAME ROAD.

"Have like some road with honest men. So far as I am personally concerned they cut no more figure in my future than in my past. The yelping of any other pack of woives would be as potential in my destinies. I come from the Wabash, not from the Hudson; from Indiana, not from New York. It is not necessary that I be cheek by jowl with the wolves of Wall street. I return when I leave here to my own people, not these pirates of the New York banks, and the fact that I do not suit in my leadership the larcenous, the vish tastes of that robbers' roost will gain me warmest welcome in Indiana which a man can receive."

Yet the Senator reported, and has partly discussed, and is ready to pass a bill through the Senate and enact it into a law to give up to the bank I have described, with its great temptations o fraud, and its staff of thieves that the Senator has described, the $10,000 reserved from its circulation.

The twin measures so far developed, as yet, by the coalition are the amendment of the Sherman bill, so as so drive out the silver that is not coined, whether in the Treasury or in the ores where nature planted it, from all chance of coinage and circulashops or in a hostile foreign land; and at the same time to increase the powers of the national banks. This double-barreled shot at the silver-miners should not be fired from the American Senate.

This is not fair treatment to the silver-miner who has added so much wealth to the United States, such true support to all other industries, and who with his predecessors has placed monuments of glowing brightness along the shining way of the entire march of civilization, and has assisted in the work of the divine exaltation of the human family in all its history.

It must be known to the Committee on Finance that every national-bank note issued by the Government is ultimately to be redeemed in gold, if that is demanded by the holder.

It has been supposed to require $100,000,000 of gold in the Treasury to protect the $346,000,000 of greenbacks that are outstanding. Mr. Sherman, when he was Secretary of the Treasury, bought $80,000,000 of this gold with silver certificates. Since its purchase, in 1878 or 1879, it has cost the people in actual taxes $60,000,000 to hold this reserve in the Treasury. How soon will it be that we shall have to borrow two or three hundred millions of gold to protect the $246,000,000 of greenbacks left unprotected, to pay the bonds that secure $200,000,000 of the national-bank notes, and the $151,000,000 of notes issued under the Sherman law?

Whatever sums we are compelled to borrow for these purposes will be at the constant and increasing expense of the people. The gold will be held, as the $100,000,000 now in the Treasury is held, as dead money on which interest must be paid. The people must be taxed to pay it. How long it is to be thus held no man can foresee or even guess.

Mr. Foster and Mr. Carlisle have added the $151,000,000 of Treasury notes issued under the Sherman law of 1890 to our gold obligations, when they could as easily, as safely, and as honorably have placed them on the list with the silver certificates is sued under the Bland-Allison act, thus increasing the gold debt to within a small fraction of $500,000,000, at a time when the speculators in gold were shipping it across the Atlantic, not in reality to pay debts or to protect our credit, but to raise a clamor against silver, in order to compel us to abandon it. It is even said that $5,000,000 silver certificates have been paid by us in statute, and the Treasury notes under the Sherman law are payable in gold or silver at the option of the Secretary of the Treas-Nothing short of cold offrontery could ever be the attribute of a man who would complain of receiving payment of these Treasury notes in silver dollars and claim that his contract was reasury notes at siver donate and claim that his contract was violated. If such a contract existed between private parties, such a refusal would be considered dishonest. When it concerns the Government and involves the taxation of the people to get the gold to make the payment, such a refusal is an act of public eridy.

If the gold policy of the Sherman law is made absolute and inflexible by the proposed amen iment of that law now under consideration, the borrowing and taxing policy must also be maintained. The Government must be constantly in active competition with our own people to accumulate gold to protect the Treasury, and the people must be unrelentingly taxed and the taxes made payable in gold, to keep up the Treasury supply and to prevent our Secretaries from placing the Treasury into voluntary bankruptcy.

The limited supply of gold must make the burden of this forced lean crushing to the people of the United States.

This same policy must bring our people in competition with the governments of Europe also in this world-wide scramble for that metal. All of those governments must have gold to support their military attitude toward other neighboring powers. Their fate depends on this turning point.

In this competitive contest for gold the hoarding of it by rival and hostile powers must diminish the volume that remains free to support commerce and supply the demands of the arts.

the support commerce and supply the demands of the arts.

The daily labor of the workingman, which is his bread, is to be paid with 50 cents in silver instead of a dollar in gold. The gold is not for him, but the subsidiary silver coin must suffice for his necessities. That is legal-tender money for ten days' work at a dollar per day, and it is short in weight 180 grains of The labor is reduced in price to 50 cents, because gold prices everything, and is double the value that it should be and would be if silver was its equal before the law. Why is this? Because gold is too scarce to buy the productions of labor at a fair

There is not enough of it to go around at a fair price for labor. A dollar's worth of labor is priced at 50 cents. Gold is not coined in dollars or in smaller coins, and he must accept 50 cents in silver, which is the gold price of one dollar's worth of labor. Thus labor is made to bear the burden of competition with our own Government and with other governments, and with all capitalists and banks everywhere; and it is no wonder that the Prices of labor shrink as gold becomes scarcer.

But the laborer in the factory is told that with a single gold standard all prices shrink in nearly equal proportions, and that he can now buy as much with $1 as he could formerly buy with $2 of all the necessaries of life. That is in some degree true;

$2 of all the necessaries of life. but it is a sad truth to laborers.

The greater truth is ignored, in this exegesis of the economy of human toil, that the recompense of every toiler, as a rule, de pends upon the wages that every other laborer gets, at least in the same country. There is that brotherhood and mutual de-pendence in labor, and its fruits, that causes every toiler to feel the weight of any burden that is laid on those of every other class of laborers, and each dripping tear salts the whole cup.

If the slave and the free man work in adjoining fields, the cheapness of slave labor, because it is unpaid, lowers the price of the free labor that must be paid. It is the nonproducer whose necessities compel him to employ labor and purchase its fruits and who pays for them in the profits of capital, loaned or invested in speculative ventures. It is the capitalist who, with his interest, his usury, his exchange, and cent per cent, must still live on the labor of other men, that supplies to labor its net

The producers and nonproducers are classes almost as distinct The producers and nonproducers are classes almost as distinct as the people of distant countries. Producers as a class must be toilers, while nonproducers as a class "toil not, neither do they spin." Necessity makes toilers of men, and the absence of that law makes them mere consumers. If the consumers, who must furnish the net profit to labor, can price the money in which the producer shall be paid for his toil, the slavery of human labor becomes as abject and servile as African slavery ever was. The limit of its forbearance is only defined by its interests or its heaveylesse, in which merey is a quality that is terests or its benevolence, in which mercy is a quality that is

That is exactly what this so-called repeal bill, this makeshift of the capitalized classes and the idlers—mushrooms that spring up on the dung heaps of human waste—inflicts upon labor. This repeal bill prices the toil of honest working men and women to a lower and constantly sinking limit by the increased power of gold to tyrannize over it. When gold is the only metal money, as it must be when silver is only a commodity and its future production is cut off by this bill, all labor will be priced in gold and all commercial credit will be based upon it.

The supply of gold, unsupported by silver, is not enough to furnish a compensating price to labor or production, and they must both sink at the will of the capitalistic classes.

This declaration is sustained by the opinions of financial and political economists, but more conclusively by the better judgment of common sense and the final demonstration of all human ment of common sense and the man demonstration of all human experience. The owners of gold, in such a case, become the autocrats of the credit system of banking, and that is the final ruin of the laboring and producing classes if the alternations of money from scarcity to plethora can ruin them.

In the United States we have now a paper currency, all of which is redeemable by the Government, of not less, as I understand is then give dellars in paper to one of gold, and that gold.

stand it, than six dollars in paper to one of gold, and that gold must be borrowed money, for which we must pay heavy interest.

also in gold.

Our paper money is kept at par only by the power of taxation. Strike that out and our paper money would sink to 50 per cent of its present value or less.

All our taxation is upon current industries-labor. it is upon incomes or upon the issues of banks, and the tarifi and internal taxation paid by the wealthy give no relief or favors to the producers, so that the duty of redeeming the currency and of paying interest upon our bonds, and the bonds also when due, is shouldered down upon the annual productions of labor.

It is therefore of vital moment to the laboring and producing classes that the banking credit system should be under such restraints, if that is possible, that the volume of the currency should not be under the sole control of the banks, as to its expansion and contraction. It is just at this point that the people are handed over by our banking laws to the mercy of the banks; and their mercy is that of the octopus for its victim. The banks use their money, by preference, to back up the gamblers in food and raiment and stocks and enable them to destroy the people with corners and combinations to raise and depress, at their own sweet will, the selling price of every staple commodity of our

While this system exists and the people are taxed to give it credit and power, their sufferings and apprehensions of coming evils will continue and increase. The war provoked by these banks may be a long one, but it will destroy them. The theory of our Government is that the labor of the people, in our rich fields of industry, shall furnish the basis of banking, which is gold and silver. It is not that the Government shall furnish this basis, either by taxation of the people or by usurping their this basis, either by taxation of the people or by usurping their right to mine gold and silver and to have it coined into money. Give to the people freely this right reserved to them in the Constitution, to supply the precious metals for coinage at the mints, and the bankers will not look to their taxation for these natural and just foundations of credit, but will look to their free and voluntary labor for this indispensable supply. The mining laborers will then get their just reward for their toil, and our treasures of precious metals in the mountains of the West will not be condemned to lay useless in the mines or to expulsion to foreign lands. In our dealings with these problems, if they are in any proper sense problematical, our attention is first demanded by the pending legislation for the benefit of the banks and not the relief of the people.

Even while the country is being warmed with the glow of returning prosperity arising from the confidence of the people in themselves and their Government, that the banks have vainly tried to destroy, they further demand haste and pressure that tried to destroy, they further demand haste and pressure that threatens the Senate with compulsion and duress and Senators with pains and penalties for obstructing the passage of this bill. The banks and their following, seeing the ship of state rising out of the waves in spite of their efforts to submerge it, are eager to claim the advantage of the post hoc propter hoc argument and to assert that they have saved the country, while we know they have only failed to destroy it.

Pass this bill and they will treat the country to another expansion and another boom. Then they will cause another contraction, when it is convenient for the gamblers in stocks and provisions to pocket another year's labor of the people through nother depression.

This is the instability of trade that has so often shaken the country like an earthquake, and now threatens to engulf it.

If this little financial earthquake which was begun by the banks to frighten the people into submission, which was begun as stage thunder to alarm us into the quietude of despair, has opened a real chasm in this forum which must be filled with a living sac-rifice, let not our Marcus Curtius (of Indiana) alone fill it. Let it be filled with a holocaust of the Democracy. The Democratic national resolve is that the Sherman law is "a cowardly makeshift." Let us not, by clinging to the worst features of it, make it by adoption our contemptible makeshift. If anybody in our midst desires to climb down into the chasm on a Republican stepladder and reconnoiter for a chance to fill with a sham, I am afraid that my admiration for him will not stir in my heart the grateful sympathy that the Romans had for their hero who, having clothed himself in his burnished armor, mounted his brave and faithful war horse, and, thus accoutered leaped into the chasm, filled it with a glorious sacrifice and sed it, saving his country.

If that legend is to be repeated and realized here, let the Democratic party prove faithful to its heroic traditions and its brave pledges and go headlong into the chasm. Let us all leap together into the abyss that we have selected for our living tomb. I will join hands with the old guard, and we will leave the fatal brink of the chasm together, and bequeath our glory and our usefulness as a legacy and a bequest to a country we could serve in no other way

If we promised too much to the people at Chicago, let us not ask the Republicans to assist us in revoking the promise. The Democratic party has decorated the entire Sherman law with its contempt and commanded us to slay the cowardly make-shift outright. In obedience to that command I will vote for a substitute for this bill that the Sherman law, every part of it, shall be repealed.

If the coalition will not remain with us after the funeral, if we go to the bottom of the chasm and they refuse to help us out, as they will refuse, we will have the glory of having perished in a good cause and they will thrive on what we leave as the administrators de bonis non of our estate.

In the amendment to the Sherman law, which is called "unconditional repeal" by the most audacious and mendacious abuse of language that Satan ever adopted to cover a brazen falsehood, there is found all that silver will ever get if it shall pass, until the people have spoken again in a Congressional or Presidential

The proposed amendment, falsely styled "unconditional repeal," is intended to be the final act in the death of the silver metal. That is the purpose of the majority of its supporters. When they get that they will be content, and no movement for its resurrection will be made.

The repeal of the entire bill would leave the people in a more hopeful condition than the repeal of the first section, the pur-chasing clause. We will have reached the bottom of the abyss at one bound, and the unterrified Democracy will set to work to climb out; whereas, if we amend the Sherman bill and adopt the cowardly makeshift as a Democratic measure, we shall go about the streets like the poor Jewish murderer, condemned to bear the rotting corpse of his victim bound to his shoulders until it has fallen to pieces, crying out, "Who shall deliver us from this body of death."

Out and out repeal of the Sherman law is better for the cause of silver monetization than the repeal of the purchasing clause of that act. That amendment of this law, proposed in this bill, leaves silver coinage, even as to the metal now in the vaults of the Treasury, optional with the Secretary of the Treasury. That such option will be exercised so as to leave the bullion in the Treasury uncoined, is as certain as that the Secretaries have not produced a coin from it in three years.

The alleged option is a false interpretation, both of the letter and spirit of that act. It is a presumptious usurpation of the one-man power, so odious to all right-minded Americans. The discretionary power to coin money, or to refuse to coin it, is a power more fatal to liberty than would be the power to declare war or to suspend the writ of habeas corpus. The most absolute monarch in the world would be dethroned and executed by his subjects if he, without the advice of a council or cabinet responsible to the people, should undertake so radical a measure as it is claimed that the Sherman law justifies.

Can Mr. Carlisle be permitted, in his discretion, to raise or depress the market for silver, by giving it coinage as legal-tender money or by refusing it? Yet the clauses of the Sherman law that this bill remarks, with the construction placed upon it by Mr. Secretary Foster and Mr. Secretary Carlisle, gives to him, under that construction, the power to coin the bullion or him, under that construction, the power to coin the bullion or to keep it locked in the Treasury vaults. He can increase or decrease at pleasure the legal-tender money of the people. I would leave no room in the law for a discretion in that matter. We crown him dictator of finance, of coinage, and of the markets, when we surrender that power into his hands.

The entire repeal of the Sherman law would be better than the repeal of the first section and the resnactment of the remaining sections, because it would take away from the Secretary of the Treasury the express option to redeem the notes issued under its provisions in gold or silver. They would stand on under its provisions in gold or silver. They would stand on the same footing with greenbacks if the entire law was repealed, and the option exercised by the Secretary of the Treasury in redeeming them in gold or silver would be at his peril.

If he should be a candidate for the Presidency, as all Secretaries of the Treasury are either known or supposed to be, the people could ask him why he chose to redeem in silver, and so obtain the votes of the common people; or in gold, and so getan election fund from the banks; and he could not reply that Congress required him to redeem the notes in the one or the other coin, and therefore he could not redeem partly in gold and partly in silver.

This law as it is and as this bill preserves and reënacts it, creates a statutory competition between gold and silver coin. When the dealer in gold wishes to raid the Treasury for a profit or a commission, to be paid him by conspirators against the Government, the discretion vested and confirmed in the Secretary by this amendment of the Sherman law enables him to comply with the insolent demand rather than rebuke it with a stern refusal, when he is ready to threaten the Government with this question: "Is the Treasury of the United States bankrupt, that it cannot provide gold to meet my demand?"

When such a demand is made by one holding a promise payable in gold or silver coin, at the discretion of the Secretary, his tright at such a call reminds one of the timidity of an elephantat the nibbling of a mouse. France answers such questions with this response: "The credit of France is pledged for the security of the Republic against the vigilance of neighboring states that are our enemies; and is not pledged to enable you and them to dictate to us a financial policy to suit your greed and their hostility.

A Secretary of the Treasury who had the courage to look for a moment at the credit and resources of the United States, while his eager and longing gaze is diverted from the vision of the Presidency, would say, would have said, indeed, to the man named by the Senator from Kentucky, in his great argument delivered in the Senate on the 4th day of this October, who had conspired to loot the Treasury and were under foreign pay:

"You will not alarm a Government as to its credit that has paid $5.000,000,000 of debt and interest in thirty years through paid $5,000,000,000 of debt and interest in thirty years through your mean exploit of attempting to defame its good name by making a corner on the gold in the Treasury. 'Get thee behind me, Satan.' The credit of this Government is not a power in the hands of gold or stock gamblers. Go back to your foreign em-ployers and tell them that this splendid American Republic is not a football to be kicked around by them at their pleasure.

Such a response would have preserved the parity between gold and silver, while the timid submission to their insolent demands only makes the preservation of the parity impossible. If silver needed lifting up to preserve the parity, it was his duty to lift it up, and not make its full legal-tender value a byword and a reproach.

If silver had been thus defended by our Secretaries of the Treasury, every holder of an American security in Europe would have said: "The United States declares for the parity of silver coin with gold, and the hoarding of silver in the Treasury must raise its value; the supply is growing short; under European pressure the mines are closing. Silver amine is more likely to occur than overproduction. We will join the United States in its wise policy of bimetallism; we will make the silver States in its wise policy of bimetallism; we will make the silver as good as gold, and thereby lose nothing on the debts due us and on the dividends coming to us from the vast interests we own in their railroads. We virtually own many of the factories, banks, breweries, town, city, and State bonds, mines, grazing lands, mortgaged farms, gas works, water works, and town acity property in the United States. We own India, and fix a gold value for the silver rupees of those subjects, which is far above the commercial value of the silver that they are coined from. Why should we not be indulgent to our clients—our from. Why should we not be indulgent to our clients—our former subjects—in the United States?"

They would not "kill the goose that lays the golden egg" because her wings are tipped in oxidized silver gray. When the cowardice of the money dealer infects the Cabinet we may look for conspiracy at home and abroad, and consequent humiliation and distress for the people. All these dividends on stocks owned abroad must come out of the annual earnings of the people, and sent abroad in gold at an enormously inflated value before the men who create them can eat the bread of their toil, or have the flavor of profit, which must be paid to them in silver

Yet there are jeremiads in Presidential messages and in all sorts of reports and speeches—sobbing lamentations—lest the laboring man should be paid in legal-tender silver dollars. Having no gold dollars, they having been stricken from the coinage, how is a poor man, who earns a dollar with a day's work and is paid in a paper dollar, to have it redeemed in gold at the Treasury? If such arguments are not sodden in folly, they must be denounced as hypocrisy.

This amended Sherman bill, we are told, is not expected to stand. Something better is promised. They tell us that this

"cowardly makeshift" is so great an obstruction to the keen financial vision of the new doctors of finance that it must be torn down. Not demolished entirely, but left to stand as to all but the top section, in deference, I suppose, to the bipolitical leadership of the coalition, one wing of which is led by a chronic gold general and the other by an oft-defeated silver marshal. When the top section is demolished, then the grand marshal of the silver forces will take the field for a rapid march for "the promised land." But then, yes then, the great gold general, intrenched behind the remaining barrier of the unrepealed sections of the Sherman law, will say to the gallant marshal "Halt! and give the countersign. This is the citadel of the gold king and his royal retinue, which you have agreed not to attack during this campaign. You must not, can not advance one step.

If the grand marshal shall then sound the advance, and will permit the weary soldiers of the old guard to follow him, we will

If the grand marshal shall then sound the advance, and will permit the weary soldiers of the old guard to follow him, we will struggle to our feet and follow "the forlorn hope" to victory or to honorable graves. But it will then be too late. The surrendered bastions of the Sherman bill, left standing in their deadly array, will repel us, and silver money will die the death.

array, will repel us, and silver money will die the death.
What are we asked to look to for the restoration of the country to a healthy financial condition after we have reënacted all that is hostile to silver in the Sherman law?

I leave this subject, Mr. President, with a knowledge that the die is cast. The Senate, the House of Representatives, the coalition, and the President of the United States have determined that this measure shall prevail, and we have nothing now to look to, so far as I can see, but some vague promises made upon this floor, which are entirely incapable of being realized. The President of the United States would not have driven a majority of the Democrats in this Chamber into this corner and have compelled them into this unfortunate condition—where the Senator from Ohio has exercised the power, it seems, of marking out what we shall do or what shall be done by the majority of this body—that would not have occurred, if the President did not have his face set against the free coinage of silver. I regret it very much, but I do not deceive myself that the President of the United States has made a formal declaration, emphatic and, of course, irrevocable, I am afraid, that there is to be no free coinage of silver in this country, and no approximation to it, until we have first secured the assent of foreign powers.

I am atterly hopeless in that direction. I think it is a matter impossible of accomplishment. I do not believe that the form and theory of our Government is at all adapted to making any such obligations binding upon our people, or binding upon foreign countries. I had the honor and the pleasure of discussing this question with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. Allison], who is a very able and a very candid man, and I think the result of the brief debate was to satisfy the Senate that it was a matter of legislative impracticability—impossibility, I will say—that we could formulate an agreement with foreign countries in respect of our currency which should be binding upon them and binding upon as the millenium, and I have not the slightest hope of it nor the slightest confidence in it. It may do for a foil; it may do for a measure of amusement; it may do to flatter the people with the idea that something is to be done for their benefit; but the result will never be reached.

In one respect, Mr. President, we have a people to be admired, to be loved, to be reverenced as a man would reverence an honest and sweet woman who was his wife—it is the confidence and the faith and the abiding trust the people have in the men whom they elect to represent them in the high offices of the country. They seem to be willing to endure almost anything with patience, and the least indication of a promise of relief that we hold out to them will cause them to endure pains and mortifications and distresses which would wring anguish and denunciation from any other people in the world—not denunciations of violence, for they will bear them with fortitude, patience, and submission, trusting in God and in their leaders that all will come right at sacrifices to their country.

Such a people, Mr. President, deserve at our hands an equal recognition of duty and devotion on our part, and we should be tender of their rights, and when the powers we undertake to exercise appear to be in conflict with rights reserved to them under the Constitution of their country, we ought to be very cautious and go very slow in interfering with them.

Now, here we are, the Democratic party in this body, according to all the declarations which have been made, particularly those of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], knowingly violating the seventh article of the Chicago platform, which contained pledges to the people of the United States which they translated as sacred promises and which they believed to be honorable pledges for the full remonetization of silver. That is what they believed. We are disappointing all of them, and we are creating trepidation, anguish, and resentment, and after awhile we shall create rebellion amongst those people toward our authority; they will dispute our friendship for them, they will commence branding us as traitors to their cause, and men who have tried to serve them honestly and faithfully will be crushed under the feet of the multitude who will rush for redress when they find that their leaders have deceived them.

I lament all this. I feel it very deeply. My attitude is this: The Democratic party is to-day what it was in the days of Gen. Jackson. I see no difference in it. If there is any motive or any power or any principle in the Democratic party which was opposed to the creed of the pure Democrats who supported that faithful and great man and his successors and his predecessors in his office, then, Mr. President, I am out of place in the Democratic party; but I believe that the power still resides with that party which honors the rights of the people under the Constitution of the United States with a sincere respect, to bring them again into the full possession of all their constitutional rights, and there is no constitutional right that I can think of which ought to be prized more than that which enables the people of the United States by their labor in the mines, which God has bestowed upon them, to bring forth the precious metals and go to the mints of the country and have those metals converted into coin.

I leave this subject, Mr. President, not expecting for a long time, if ever, to have anything else to say upon it until the people shall take it up and dispose of it according to their sovereign will. I shall yield to that judgment when it is rendered, and to nothing else.

nothing else.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, after the declarations of the chairman of the Committee on Finance and the demonstration that every amendment proposed to the pending measure is to be defeated, I should not trouble the Senate with any remarks in the closing hours of this debate, except for the fact that I have proposed an amendment, which I shall not press.

In that amendment, Mr. President, I proposed two measures which I thought absolutely necessary to the financial safety of the United States.

The first gives the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to refuse, in his discretion, gold for export. The Bank of England protects its gold reserve by increasing the rate of interest and retaining gold in Great Britain under an act of Parliament which fixes the price of gold when brought to the Bank of England. The Bank of France, under its charter, has the power to protect French finances by refusing to pay more than one-half of any check or draft in gold, and by absolutely refusing to pay out gold when in its opinion it is taken for purposes of export. Under existing circumstances the Treasury of the United States is simply a vast banking institution, without power to protect its reserve, and the spectacle was lately exhibited to the world of London speculators dragging from the Treasury of the United States, from the unwilling hands of the custodians of the gold reserve, this gold to be taken abroad for the purposes of foreign nations, for the commission that was paid to these agents for their services.

Is it possible that we are to leave the Treasury of the United States in this condition? We have now a little over $80,000,000 of gold reserve in the Treasury; that may be taken out before the 1st of January by the same processes which were used a few months ago in that direction. Is the Secretary of the Treasury to be left helpless and hopeless when we are told here in the most eloquent tones that gold is absolutely necessary to the stability of our financial system and that it is a crime to announce the doctrine thatanything but goldshall be considered the great financial agency of the Government? If this be so, then we should provide means to retain this gold as a matter of self-defene, and it is criminal, in my judgment, to leave the Treasury in the present condition without legislation looking to the end I have named.

In the second place, Mr. President, we have now in the Treasury about $53,000,000 of silver for which we have paid the tax money of the people of the United States, representing the profitor seigniorage upon silver purchased under the Bland act and under the Sherman law. What are we to do with it? Is it to lie there, a mere spectacular exhibit for the tourists who come to the capital? What are we to do with it? Are we to coin it? Are we to sell it at auction? What private gentleman or business man would consider himself fit to transact business who should allow his silver to lie hoarded and useless when he needed the money in his ordinary business transactions?

It has been stated upon this floor, and is no longer a secret, that we now have a bankrupt Treasury, with a deficit of $50,000,000 in front of us. The Secretary of the Treasury within my knowledge has expressed a hope that this seigniorage may be utilized as a miscellaneous receipt in the Treasury, to be paid out for the ordinary expenses of the Government. We have high authority for coining this seigniorage, whatever may be the opinion now of our friends on the opposite side of the Chamber on this question.

The distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] in a speech delivered in this body August 30, 1893, used the following language:

Another thing. I think, could be done for immediate relief. By that strange rule of legic by which you can coin an equal amount of dollars out of a given quantity of bullion and then have a surplus over, if there is out a surplus in the Treasury (and I suppose there is, because some Senators have said there is), I would undoubtedly coin that surplus, and use it, if necessary, for the ordinary operations of the Government to prevent a deficiency, or for any purpose that it might be lawfully coined.

Mr. President, I do not know if there be any change of opinion on the part of the distinguished Senator from Ohio and those who agree with him upon that side of the Chamber in regard to this seigniorage, but the fact is undeniable that we have now a deficit; that the Secretary of the Treasury is pressed for money with which to meet the ordinary demands upon the Government, and that this $53,000,000 which would circulate amongst the people us gold dollars would circulate with the stamp of the Government, is lying there idle and useless in this great emergency.

But, Mr. President, I did not rise so much to state what is in the amendment that I do not propose to offer, as to accentuate and emphasize in a very few words what I consider the salient points of the pending measure which in a very few hours will become the law.

As I understand the controversy, after we have had three months' debate in this Chamber, it has come to this: The Government of the United States by act of Congress deliberately goes into the arena of the world to scramble for gold. We have acceded, as the representatives of the States and the people, to the demands of the money power of the world and of this country that the purchase and coinage of silver shall cease; that it shall not be standard money; that gold shall be the only standard and sole measure of value in the United States.

I am clear that I do not overstate this momentous proposition.

I am clear that I do not overstate this momentous proposition. It is not answered by the statement that the silver in existence will continue to circulate as money. We have struck down silver as standard money. We have trampled upon the platforms of both the Democratic party and the Republican party, which declared for the use of both gold and silver, without discrimination against either. We have gone, I repeat, into the scramble for gold. We enter now into this competition with all the great nations of the world with $$1,000,000 of gold in the Treasury of the United States and without any provision to raise more.

If this country is to go to the gold standard, then the Senator from Ohio is entirely logical when he declares that gold bonds

If this country is to go to the gold standard, then the Senator from Ohio is entirely logical when he declares that gold bonds must be issued to furnish us with the weapons of offense and defense in this great national warfare. Those of us who oppose unconditional repeal saw this result from the beginning, and prophesied it from the commencement of this debate. Those who vote for unconditional repeal do not follow their proposition to its logical sequence unless they vote to issue bonds to raise gold to put this country on an equality with other countries in the contest upon which we have deliberately entered. Are we ready to do this? Are we prepared to go to the people of the United States, already oppressed in the agricultural and mining districts beyond any distress that has occurred in the past, and tell them that, with $53,000,000 of silver lying in the shape of bullion packed in the Treasury, we propose to add to obtain gold for rivalry with the nations of Europe?

Mr. President, it has been charged that those of us who op-

Mr. President, it has been charged that those of us who oppose unconditional repeal were protecting simply the silver mines of the West. It is false. If I should speak for any self-ish purpose I could respond to this challenge by stating that the lead of Montana and of Idaho comes in direct competition with the lead produced in the State of Missouri. I have been appealed to that I should support unconditional repeal in order to do away with this competition with the lead products of my own State. I have replied to constituents who have made that statement to me that I am not engaged in protecting any commodity; that I am attempting to prevent contraction of the currency, which, in my judgment, is the greatest curse that can come to the people of the United States.

He who doubts, after the argument of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. Jones] and the teaching of history, that contraction means doubling the lurdens upon the backs of labor and the

He who doubts, after the argument of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. Jones] and the teaching of history, that contraction means doubling the burdens upon the backs of labor and the debtor, that it means putting down the prices of agricultural products, and thereby diminishing the means of the husbandman to meet his liabilities dally incurred—he who can doubt that proposition is beyond the reach of argument or appeal. Contraction means the lessening of prices of products of the agricultural States, which are now more depressed than any other commodities in the United States, and it means at the same time that the burdens placed upon the debtors of the United States shall be increased.

In the Census Reports we find that in the last ten years, from 1880 to 1890, there was an increase of population in the United States, for the decade, of 27.26 per cent, about 2½ per cent for each of those ten years. I ask the friends of unconditional repeal, now in their hour of triumph, when they have struck down silver and consummated—honestly, beyond question, what they conceive to be designed for the popular good—do you propose, as you are doing, to stop the circulation of the country where it is; that there shall be no more silver, no more paper, no more gold, while the population of the country is increasing in the ratio which the Census Reports show beyond any question? By this legislation you say to the people of the United States: "You must transact your business with the amount of currency you now have; your population may continue to increase; emigration may come in at the rate of 500,000 or 600,000 a year, to say nothing of natural increase; but your volume of money shall remain where it is."

We are told by the statistician of the Treasury Department that the per capita distribution of money in this country to-day is $25.29 to each man, woman, and child in the United States. But what intelligent man does not know that this statement is absolutely false and misleading?

While it may be upon the surface an exact statement of the per capita distribution of money, what one of my auditors does not know now that the real circulation of the country is nuch more than one-half of this amount? We know the gold reserve and the silver in the Treasury of the United States is not in circulation, although it is counted as the basis of this ratio established by the statistician.

We know that the $1,000 and $500 bills do not go into circulation, although they are included in this estimate. It may be stated, as a reasonable estimate, that $15 per capita is all the money now in circulation amongst the people of this country. My friend from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] says that it is concentrated in the large cities; that in the agricultural and remote districts money has almost ceased to circulate, and commodities are exchanged in the daily transactions of life. Yet in the face of this you go to the people of the United States and say, "We propose to stop the increase of circulation whilst the increase of population goes on, and also to contract the volume of money $3.500,000 a month by ceasing to buy silver."

increase of population goes on, and also to contrast the volume of money $3,500,000 a month by ceasing to buy silver."

Mr. President, that is the question of the future. France today, with 40,000,000 of people, with an area of territory about one-fourteenth that of the United States, has a per capita distribution of about $41 to each man, woman, and child within her dominion. France is an old and finished country. Her roads, canals, bridges, and public buildings are all completed. We are a young, active, aggressive people, with an enormous internal commerce, in whose veins flows the tide of aggression and conquest. We need more money. We need it to develop our lands. We need it for the enterprises that are daily pressing upon us. Yet you stop this circulation where it is without any means of increasing it, and go to the people of the country upon this

Mr. President, I do sympathize with the people of the silver States. I should be ashamed of myself if I did not. I say now in my place in the Senate that no czar or kaiser would desolate any insurrectionary province as we are desolating the silver States of the West. You have struck down in those States everything that makes life dear. You have impoverished men in those States, men who were yesterday millionaires, and you have shut out the sunlight from the homes and hearts of all their people.

As the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. Wolcott] said—and I can never forget it—this is the first instance in the history of the human race when men of Anglo-Saxon lineage have been punished because they discovered too much of the precious metals.

When the Spaniards carried back to the Old World the gold and silver coming from the conquest of Mexico and Peru, they were received as the saviors of civilization. Europe had been depressed for a half century by a monetary condition which never been equaled. The supply of gold and silver that came from this continent caused an era of prosperity in Europe which for fifty years before had not been known to those people.

When the gold of California and Australia was discovered the night of monetary depression passed away from the whole world because of the greater supply of precious metals that had come to the relief of mankind.

Yet these men, our kinsmen, who left the luxury of civilization and went out beneath the shadows of the great mountains and in the canyons that are eternal and there dug out the silver with which to press on the chariot wheels of civilization, are to be treated as criminals have not been treated in humane govern-

But, Mr. President, again. Let me state another issue that you must meet before the people. Do not imagine that this is the last of this struggle. This is but the skirmish line. The shock of battle is yet to come. Do not think that after you have destroyed one half the metallic money of this country and put the ban upon it you can escape the judgment of a free people upon what you have done. In every State, county, and town-ship the issue will be made, and the people will pass verdict upon ship the issue will be made, and the people will pass verdict upon what is done to-day.

If there ever was an act in this country more odious than any and all others combined, it was the act of 1873 that struck the silver dollar from the coinage. When the people of the United States discovered that it had been done they arose with unanimity unexampled in our political history, and retaliated upon the men who had done it. In 1878 they sent a Congress here, fresh from the people, upon that issue, which passed an act over the Presidential veto in less than six hours after that veto had been sent to the House of Representatives.

Presidential veto in less than six hours after that veto had been sent to the House of Representatives.

What do you do now? You remit the country to that act of 1873. You have wiped out the Bland-Allison law. You have left the people without a muniment of silver upon the statute book. You say to the people of the country, "We will stop your circulation of money where it is; you shall go beck to the act of 1873 which you have trampled under foot and which will go down to posterity anathematized by the whole people of this country."

That is the issue that you shall meet in the next election. We produce that this matter shall sleep where it is. We pro-do not propose that this matter shall sleep where it is. We propose that it shall be known to every portion of this country what is the exact effect of the bill that will be enacted into a law by the action of the Senate this afternoon.

Mr. President, we are told that something miraculous will be done for silver hereafter. I do not doubt the sincerity of my friend from Indiana. I do not question his integrity of opinion be done for silver hereafter. I do not doubt the sincerity of my friend from Indiana. I do not question his integrity of opinion when he says this. But the traveler who chases the mirage upon the burning desert follows something more substantial than the hope that the money power of this country after enacting this law will ever permit silver to receive any assistance again from the hands of the representatives of the people. There is one hope left for silver; and I speak of silver as the expansion of the currency of a great people, not the $70,000,000 that is produced in this country annually. That is not the issue, but in the great struggle between bimetallism and the single gold standard I take silver to be the representative of bimetallism, for that metal to-day is attacked.

for that metal to-day is attacked.

Mr. President, silver will reassert itself because the people of this country intend that there shall be no contraction of the currency. Silver will again become a standard money. You have rejected a compromise which would have given some relief to the people of the silver-producing States and at the same time prevent the ruinous contraction of which I have spoken. That compromise has been rejected. Unconditional repeal must

That compromise has been rejected. Unconditional repeal must be had. The edict has gone forth.

Sir, for one I am glad that it is so. I am glad that the Democratic party, in which I shall die, will assert its ancient principles—equality amongst the people, justice to all, no monopoly in mining, and no centralization in finance. Our fathers asserted their independence against the despotic centralization of the Old World, and stamped their sincerity in their bloody footprints at Valley Forge. We, their descendants, will make, God willing, another declaration of independence—independence from financial centralization and the methods of European money despotism—not to protect this interest or that, but to give to the people of the whole United States and every portion of it a suffiple of the whole United States, and every portion of it, a sufficient volume of money to transact the business of the country.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, on the 14th day of July, 1890, the so-called Sherman law took effect. It was passed in the House and in the Senate by a solid Republican vote, and was opposed by every Democratic Representative and every Democratic Senator.

In the campaign in 1891 and 1892 those of us who had opposed the iniquitous Sherman law and who favored making silver an issue upon that law were told that the important question was tariff reform, and that the financial question must be relegated to the rear. The distinguished junior Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS], now so expressly espousing the cause of unconditional repeal, sounded his clarion voice from one end of this land to the other in behalf of relegating the silver question to the rear and pressing the tariff to the front.

It was pressed to the front in the campaign of 1892, and by Democratic votes a Democratic triumph was secured, a Democratic President elected, a Democratic Administration inaugu-

Mr. President, I confess I so felt, and I believe ninety-nine out of every one hundred of the Democrats realized and believed, that the absolute responsibility for the Administration, executive and legislative, rested upon the Democratic organization and party. We felt that we would be responsible for whatever and party. We felt that we would be responsible for whatever legislation was enacted; that we as a party would be responsible for the executive administration. A large element in the Democratic party, therefore, feeling the responsibility that rested upon the party to redeem its pledges to the people, which pledges were the cause of the majority of the votes being cast for it, favored the calling of an early session of Congress in order that the tariff might be brought to the frontand kept there, and that tariff reform might be introduced and consummated.

Many Democrats did not believe that it was the best policy to bring to the front of the tariff reform measure financial reform or financial questions. It was known the world over that the Democratic party had at last secured unanimity in its councils upon tariff reform. It must not be forgotten that in 1878, 1879, 1880, 1881, 1882, 1883, 1884, and 1885, long before a Democratic Administration had come in or a Democratic President had declared in favor of tariff reform, in a Democratic House and among the Democratic Senators we were pleading for tariff re-form. It must also not be forgotten that three times at the instance of Eastern Democrats, protectionist Democrats, Democratic tariff reform bills were defeated in the House of Representatives and on motion of Democrats the enacting clauses were stricken out. We were told, as we are told to-day, to put the tariff question to the rear; that it would never do to press it to the front. The great tariff champion, Governor Campbell, of Ohio, was one of the prominent Democrats who voted to strike out the enacting clause of a tariff-reform measure in the Democratic House of Representatives.

We were told then in asstrong and emphatic language as we are told now to put the silver question to the rear, to put the tariff question to the rear, but we did not do it, and upon tariff reform we fought until victory was achieved: and now our friends here in the East are the most frantic tariff reformers just preceding the election who have ever been seen; but when the election is over and the victory achieved, then we behold the great Democratic leader of New York upon this floor pitching to the front headlong on the finance question, and the floor at the other end of the avenue and the tiger of New York are coming together of the avenue and the tiger of New 10th all of the avenue and the tiger of New 10th all of the in a lovely embrace. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, those of us who believe that tariff reform should have been pressed to the front did not believe that it was the best policy for a political party that the financial question should be brought to the front, and that an extra session should be called a love the start alone upon the financial question. We did not be the start alone upon the financial question. lieve that, because every man, woman, and child in the whole United States knew that the Democratic party for the present stood divided upon the silver question, just as we had stood in 1878, 1879, 1880, 1881, 1882, 1883, 1884, and 1885 upon the tariff question. The same local distinctions existing, the Eastern Democrats then opposing tariff reform as the Eastern Democrats then opposing tariff reform as the Eastern Democrate to ocrats then opposing tariff reform as the Eastern Democrats to-day oppose silver legislation, we did not think it was best. But, Mr. President, we did not know all that was going on.

We did not know the scenes enacted behind the screens or we would not have thought so. Now, let us examine and find exactly where we are. We must adjust and ascertain our exact position and what the present measure is.

position and what the present measure is.

How did the pending measure originate? Is it a Democratic measure? Is the Democratic party responsible for it? Is the Democratic Administration responsible for it? Is the national Democratic Administration, embracing the legislative as well as the executive branch, responsible for it? How did it originate? A Representative from the State of West Virginia introduced, on the 11th day of August, 1893, in the House of Representatives the unconditional repeal bill.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a bill for the resent consideration of the House.

"For the present consideration of the House." No Democratic committees had yet been organized; no Democratic machinery in the House, no Democratic caucus held in the House, no Democratic cooperation, no Democratic phalanx marching shoulder to shoulder and side by side. Not a bit of it. You could not get a caucus, you could not get a party action. Oh, no. What was it? Mr. President, the President told us what it was in his message:

This matter rises above the plane of party politics.

"This matter rises above the plane of party politics."

It vitally concerns every business and calling, and enters every household in the land.

No politics in it—not a bit of it. We could not have a Democratic caucus in the House for fear it would assume a political tinge. We could not let the measure go to a Democratic committee of the House of Representatives for fear it would be stained with partisan politics. No, no; it was brought to a vote in the House without ever having been considered in committee; without ever having received any kind of Democratic sanction, save only the recommendation of the President and individual members of the House.

What was the vote? In the House upon the amendment for the free and unlimited coinage of the standard silver dollars the yeas were 124—100 Democrats, 13 Republicans, and 11 Populists. The nays were 227—116 Democrats, and 111 Republicans. See how the division was: 111 Democrats, 13 Republicans, and 11 Populists for free coinage; against it, 116 Democrats and 111

Republicans.

Now, what was the vote on the Bland bill? On the passage of the Bland bill as a substitute for the pending measure in House the yeas were 136—110 Democrats, 15 Republicans, and 11 Populists. Nays 213—103 Democrats (7 less than voted "yea") and 110 Republicans. Upon the passage of the bill the vote was, yeas 240—139 Democrats and 101 Republicans. Nays 110— 76 Democrats, 23 Republicans, and 11 Populists.

So the bill passed the House as a nonpartisan measure, not as political measure. It came to the Senate and went to the Finance Committee, composed of eleven members, six Democrats and five Republicans, and it was reported by the Finance Committee recommended by two Democrats, the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] and the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. McPherson], and four distinguished Republican Senators, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. Morrill], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Sherman], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. Aldrich], and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. Aldrich]. I do not believe there is an unregenerate man on earth who would accuse either one of them of having any Democratic partisan bias. You could not accuse them of that. So it stands here with five members of the committee opposed to it, the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE], my colleague [Mr. VEST], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES], and the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES], four Democrats and one Republican. See how nonpartisan it is! The partisanism is on the Republican side.

The friends of true bimetallism, of the rehabilitation of silver, have made a long, a protracted, and a most earnest struggle for the recognition of silver. We have been denounced by the Re-publican, and mugwump and Democratic press of the East, and abused and villified as never has been done in any great discussion since the organization of our Government.

sion since the organization of our Government.

The President in his message as interpreted by the Administration Republicans and the Administration Democrats insisted tration Republicans are the fought against it. We said upon unconditional repeal. We fought against it. We said there ought to be some substitute; that silver should not be stricken down in the house of its professed friends; that now is the time, when we had no other legislation before Congress, when we ought to agree upon some substitute, some amendment rehabilitating silver and continuing it as a money metal of the world. We fought for this. We contended for it. Our Republican friends who favored silver joined us in this great fight and we continued it still, conducted on the decreed policy of nonpartisanism.

Finally the distinguished Senator from Ohio, the leader of the Administration upon the other side of the Senate Chamber, came to the front and denounced the Democratic majority. He told us we were imbecile, that we could not enact legislation, that we could not agree upon anything. He said, go and do what you ought to do, agree upon some measure, some compromise, and bring it in and pass it.

Then it was that heappealed to the interviewer, and in the intreview which was read here on Saturday by the senoir Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] and by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. Morgan] to-day, he proclaimed to the world that unconditional repeal was a failure, and that some compromise ought to be agreed upon, and indicating what that compromise ought to be.

Then we, as Democrats, on this side of the Chamber began to realize that we were about to be held absolutely and uncondi-tionally responsible for the result of this legislation, and we began to get together. Nonpartisanship had been laid aside, and the political banners had been hoisted in this Chamber by the Senator from Ohio. We got together. We began talking compromise. We talked compromise and compromise, first one thing and then another. It after awhile developed that we could harmonize; that we could agree upon a measure. Every Democratic Senator realized and believed that we could agree upon a measure which the Democratic President and the Democratic Secretary of the Treasury could approve without one solitary sacrifice of their principles or policies. We believed they could do it, and we believed they would do it—a compromise which the true friends of bimetallism felt was almost an unconditional sacrifice of themselves before their constituents at home.

They felt that they were giving everything away for Democratic harmony, for Democratic unification, for Democratic cooperation, and for the enactment of Democratic legislation.

Just as we thought victory had been reached, the distinguished Senator from Ohio, with his Administration Republicans, were found intrenched in our front. Our party had practically united, and we thought there would be harmony; but then it was that the incandescent light of nonpartisanism, of Republican-Mugwump-Democratic coalition was east athwart our pathway, and the Democratic Administration was revealed in all its nonpartisan perfection, with its unconditional repeal banners still in the hands equally of Republicans and Mugwumps and Democrats.

Talk about a nonpartisan measure! What does this prove when a Democratic President and Secretary of the Treasury refuse to agree with six-sevenths of the Democratic Senators and practically with the entire Democratic Senate upon a compro-mise measure and prefer to leave the Administration banner in the hands of Republicans and Democrats jointly to placing it in the hands of Democrats only? Do you tell me that is partisan legislation? Why, it is the very essence and the rectified purity of nonpartisanism. The Democratic President, knowing the di-visions in his party, must have deliberately planned and in visions in his party, must have deliberately planned and intended that this repeal measure should not be tinged with partisan Democracy, and should be only and essentially a nonparti-san Republican-Democratic-Mugwump measure, as it will be when it is enacted.

I hope no Democrat will feel that our political Democratic organization is responsible for the unconditional repeal which places us on the single gold standard of February 12, 1873, and I trust that no Republican will hereafter dare to charge the Democratic party alone with responsibility for this unconditional repeal. If it has partisanism about it, if it has the smell of the smoke of a partisan conflict about it, it is Republican partisanism and not Democratic. Had it not been for the Administration Republicans I believe, and the country will believe, that the Democratic party would have harmonized and with every Democratic vote would have passed a Democratic measure.

Mr. President, let us examine this bill just ove moment and you can see all these combinations to which I have referred blended in the language of the repeal substitute. comes the Republican-Mugwump part of this bill: Listen. Here

That so much of the act approved July 14, 1890, entitled "An act directing the purchase of silver bullion and issue of Treasury notes thereon, and for other purposes," as directs the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase from time to time silver bullion to the aggregate of 4,500,000 ounces so much thereof as may be offered in each month at the market price thereof, not exceeding $1$ for $71.25$ grains of pure silver, and to issue in payment for such purchases Treasury notes of the United States, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

That is Republicanism, Mugwumpism, the single gold standard, ure and simple. Now comes in the Democratic fringe to this pure and simple. job. Let us read it:

And it is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to continue the use of both gold and silver as standard money, and to coin both gold and silver into money of equal intrinsic and exchangeable value, such equality to be secured through international agreement, or by such safeguards of legislation as will insure the maintenance of the parity in value of the coins of the two metals, and the equal power of every dollar at all times in the markets and in the payment of debts.

Here is the second fringe of the garment of Democracy:

And it is hereby further declared that the efforts of the Government should be steadily directed to the establishment of such a safe system of bimetal-ism as will maintain at all times the equal power of every dollar coined or issued by the United States, in the markets and in the payment of debts.

Now you see the combination. That is the Democratic part of . It is only a promise, it is true, but a promise is better than nothing. The mugwump Republican part of it is unconditional repeal.

Mr. President, this was shown when we undertook to vote upon the substitute of the Finance Committee for the House bill and the yeas and nays were ordered. The House bill does not contain this Democratic fringe, these Democratic promises. It has none of them in it. It had been intimated that the bill would go into conference and there the Democratic part of it would all be stricken out; and it has even been intimated that the President wanted the House bill passed just as it was; and when we called the yeas and nays we found the distinguished Senator from Ohio leading the Administration Republicans asking unanimous consent that the call for the yeas and nays might be withdrawn so that we would not make any record upon the differences between the two bills. I was forced, though always liking to oblige him, to object to the withdrawal of the demand in order that we might put ourselves upon record in favor of the Democratic promises contained in this bill.

Now, Mr. President, the bill is going to pass. We have done our duty. It has been taken out of the hands of the Democratic organization and the banner has been placed in the hands of the combination. Republican Senators have to be consulted before anything can be done, and the Republican party to-day will be more responsible, infinitely more responsible, for the unconditional repeal than will the Democratic party.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am glad the Senator from Maine says "undoubtedly." They will bear the burden of it. They have presented to this great country the magnificent spectacle of having unanimously passed the law in 1890, declared to be a settlement of the financial question, upon which they went before the country. The Senator from Ohio, now leading the revolt against the country. it, proclaimed its virtues in the Okio campaign. It was passed in order to kill a free-coinage bill. It was passed in order to wipe out the Bland-Allison law, and it was proclaimed as a great measure. The Republican party in the campaign of 1892 went measure. The Republican party in the campaign of 1892 went before the country upon it, never repudiated it, and then the Republican party was in power here in the Senate.

The Senator from Ohio in July or August, 1892, introduced a bill for the repeal of this law, and had it referred to his own Finance Committee, composed of a majority of Republicans, but not a word did he ask upon the Senate floor that that committee might report it back or press the measure, nor did a single Republican, and he was a member of the committee. The same Senators then composed the Finance Committee on the Republican side that compose the Republican minority of the committee now. They never attempted to get that bill out of the Finance Committee. They never attempted to get it before the Senate. They were afraid by their actions (for they speak louder than words) to assume the responsibility of repealing their own measure and going back to a worse law, the law of February 12, 1873.

But the very moment the Democratic Administration is in-augurated then we see the almost solid phalanx of the Repub-lican minority upon this floor rushing pell mell to try to undo their own misdeeds, confessing before the country the worthlessness and the iniquity of their own measure. Ah, you will have the pleasure and the satisfaction of having the responsibility which the Senator from Maine assumes with the consent of his brethren there of repealing your own measure.

there of repealing your own measure.

But I know, when the distinguished Senator from Ohio has left his leadership of the Administration Republicans and gone back into his Republican party, he will then turn and laugh with satisfaction and contentment. No man in the United States will enjoy the victory he has won as much as he himself, after a twenty years determined struggle before the American people to undo the infamy of the act which was passed February 12, 1873, without the country knowing it. I do not say that it was passed clandestinely, I say the Senators ought to have known it, and the members of the other House ought to have known it; but they did not know what it contained. they did not know what it contained.

That bill was passed and has been denounced from one end of this land to the other ever since; and now after twenty years of struggle the Senator from Ohio has led the Democratic Admin-struggle the Senator from Onlo has led the Democratic Administration back upon his old law of February 12, 1873. A glorious victory for the Senator from Ohio!

I am dealing in facts, Mr. President; and I want the Senator to remember that his victory now under the banner of nonpartisanism, under the banner of patriotism, under the banner of saving this country, must not be thrown back in our faces as tinged with partisan Democracy. It has no smell and no flavor of Democratic organization in the Senate—not a bit of it. And now, when the cause of all the financial disturbances and disas ters and depressions has been removed, as you have all said that the Sherman law is the cause of these ills, then we will hold you responsible for the return of reviving industries of the country, for the halcyon days of prosperity that you have predicted.

We will expect to see your manufacturing establishments resumed, tramps taken from the highways and byways and put to employment, and the great industries of this country bounding employment, and the great industries of this country bounding and rebounding as they come in contact with the bounding properity from Australia and the Argentine Republic and all of South America and Austria-Hungary and all of Europe. We shall have the happiest and most glorious time that the world has ever seen. The farmers will have high prices for their products, labor will receive high wages, and you gentlemen then shall have all the honor and the credit of it; but if it does not come—if it does not come—you bear the responsibility.

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President, on the 2d of October a colloquy took place between the junior Sentor from Minnesota [Mr.

took place between the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WASHBURN] and the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] concerning a resolution which the Senator from Idaho had introduced to postpone the consideration of the pending bill until the s existing in the Senate from the three States of Washington, Montana, and Idaho were filled. At that time the Senator from Minnesota said:

Of the three States in question, two are not silver-producing States; they are no more interest in the coinage of silver than any other State in the Union, and they are supposed to have a very intelligent and patriotic population. Furthermore, those two States are represented by two Senators, both of whom are in favor of the repeal of the Sherman law. I should like to inquire, in view of that fact, what injustice is being done to the silver men on of whom are in lawor of the repeal of the Sherman law. I should like to in the floor of the Senate?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Will the Senator please name the two States which he says are represented by two Senators who are in favor or the unconditional repeal of the Sherman law?

Mr. WASHBURN. I will with great pleasure. They are the States of Washington and Wyoming.

Mr. DUBOIS. I should like the Senator from Minnesota to state by what authority and by whose authority he makes that assertion.

Mr. WASHBURN. By the authority of the Senators themselves.

Mr. DUBOIS. Very well. I imagine that those Senators will resent that imputation. There never has been a time when the members of Congress from those States have not voted for the free and unlimited coinage of silver, and I state that the Senators from Wyoming and Washington on this floor are not for the unconditional repeal of the Shermanlaw. The Senator from Washington [Mr. Squire] has offered an amendment in the interest of silver.

Silver.

Mr. WASHBURN. I can only state, in answer, that the Senator from Washington told me distinctly that he would vote for the unconditional repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman act.

Mr. President, I did not feel called upon at that time to make any reply whatever to the assertions that had been made by the Sentors, apparently contradictory, for they both told the truth; and, from the conversation that I had with those gentlemen from time to time, they would have been justified, perhaps, in ordinary conversation, to have classed me with reference to the measure as they did. I understand, however, that it is out of the ordinary course for a Senator on this floor to say how some other Senator will vote on a pending question.

I am frank enough to say that I have not at any time believed that unconditional repeal was the best legislation. I labored in my humble way to help bring about a compromise, but I have thought, and do now think, that in the absence of a compromise thought, and do now think, that in the absence of a compromise it is my bounden duty at this time, considering the condition of the Treasury of the United States, to vote for the unconditional repeal of the Sherman law. My position, I believe, has been gen-erally known. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] took it upon himself on Saturday to use this language:

For Colorado these are grave days. I speak only for my own State. I am advised that an adjoining State, Wyoming, desires repeal. The Senator from Minnesota made profer of its vote, and his authority has not been questioned.

This language is very offensive; and I do not see how any Senator could rest under the imputation that another Senator had proffered his vote. I did not take offense at what was said by the two Senators in the heat of debate, but the Senator from Colorado having had full time for deliberation, should have considered my rights in this matter and should not have attempted to place me in a false position. No such meaning could even be distorted out of the remarks of the Senator from Minnesota. No Senator, as he knows, ever proffered my vote in this body, and never will. Thrice have I heard the Senator from Colorado refer to those on the Democratic side with whom he voted on the election bill, commonly called the force bill; and in his last reference he said that perhaps he was not entitled to any great consideration from themat this time. Be it is said to the credit of the Democratic side, I have never heard any Senator on the other side refer to the force bill in the manner in which the Senator from Colorado has thrice referred to it. It ill becomes the Senator from Colorado to speak of my vote being comes the Senator from Colorado to speak of my vote being proffered on any proposition.
